Interested in a job that would pay for your stay in a residence hall? Resident assistants are in demand.

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

Enhanced communication skills, positive relationship establishment and leadership development are just a few of the rewards associated with becoming a resident assistant.

For interested students, applications for 1996-97 resident-assistant positions are due Dec. 6.

To obtain an application, students must attend one of six information sessions this week. The meetings supply students with information on being a resident assistant and are followed by question-and-answer periods.

The sessions cover topics including qualifications, responsibilities and rewards of a resident-assistant position and what the role of a resident assistant is within the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

"We'll really do our best to paint a picture of what these folks are going to be expected to do," said George Widenor, residence life coordinator of Housing and Dining Services.

Widenor said the information sessions don't have a specific time frame. They remain open as long as people have questions, he said. Question-and-answer periods are facilitated by senior staff around campus.

Some responsibilities of resident assistants include providing personal and academic assistance to residents, devoting significant time to personal interaction with residents and providing duty coverage on some evenings and weekends.

For applications

For applications to become a resident assistant, potential applicants need to attend one of four upcoming information sessions.

TODAY	noon	Union 206
WEDNESDAY	3 p.m.	Union 206
WEDNESDAY	7:30 p.m.	Putnam Hall
THURSDAY	4:30 p.m.	Derby 134

For more information, contact George Widenor at 395-6896.

Laurie Peterson, junior in biological and agricultural engineering and resident assistant in Putnam Hall, said through training to help others, she obtained counseling skills that she could benefit from herself.

"I like the fact that I get to be a part of this team on campus," she said. "You get to work with some of the most awesome people.

"I really love that, the people that I get to know," she said.

Two information sessions were Sunday and Monday. Four sessions are scheduled for today at noon, Wednesday at 3 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. and Thursday at 4:30 p.m. at various locations.

Widenor said there are about 75 to 80 resident-assistant positions.

"It varies from year to year based on different needs," he said.

Widenor said he expected about 30 to 35 current resident assistants to return next year, leaving the remaining positions open.

"We'll probably have close to 400 or 500 go to the information sessions total, and an applicant pool somewhere from 250 to 300, as a ballpark," Widenor said.

For about one month, applications will be screened to narrow the selection to 100 applicants. In the first week of the spring semester, those individuals will be invited to an assessment center, where they will go through a variety of group and individual interviews.

"We invariably run into having more qualified candidates than we have positions for," Widenor said. "It's always difficult to make those decisions, but it's encouraging to see so many bright young folks come out."

▶ PARKING SERVICES

Signs thwart would-be violators

ALIESA GOOD
staff reporter

Parking Services is using a bright color to increase student awareness of reserved parking stalls.

The brown reserved-stall signs on campus are being replaced with fluorescent orange signs. There are 428 10-hour and 24-hour reserved stalls on campus.

"The cost of replacing each sign, including labor, will probably be $15-$20," Peggy Winkler, acting director of Parking Services, said.

The most common reason people gave for parking in the stalls was the signs weren't legible, Winkler said.

"Making the signs fluorescent orange will eliminate that excuse," Winkler said.

The stalls are monitored 24 hours a day by Parking Services and K-State Police.

There is a $30 fine for parking in any reserved stall.

However, if the owner of the stall comes on campus and the reserved space isn't available, a $30 ticket will be issued, and the vehicle will be wheel-locked.

The owner of the stall can decide whether the vehicle should be towed.

Parking Services is in the process of replacing the signs across campus. It started in the K-State Student Union parking lot, where the majority of problems happen.

"Improvement of all parking signs on campus is one of our goals. We will be working throughout the winter months to make all signs uniform," Winkler said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Cop reports provide a vital reader service

WHY WE CARE

Cop reports are a matter of public record, historical record and public service to our readers. Keeping your name out wouldn't be fair.

It's simple: If the police assist you, ticket you or arrest you, you're going to be in the police reports on page 2.

We've had several souls begging us to keep their names out of cop reports because they don't want their parents to find out or to get fired from their jobs.

Sorry, no can do.

If we omit one person's, we'd have to allow the same courtesy to the next guy.

It goes like this: A staff writer goes down to the K-State Police and Riley County Police Department to get public-record police reports. These are just that — public record. Anyone can go down and look at them.

The reporter then writes down all the reports from the previous evening and the afternoon.

Granted, that's a lot of reports, but we cut out a few things, depending on how many reports we have. We cut minor traffic violations (speeding tickets), tows, wheel locks, lost ID reports and minor traffic accidents.

We are not ruthless with our First Amendment rights, though. If someone is raped or someone is a victim of a violent crime or domestic violence, we will not print names.

We will, however, print if someone is arrested for a rape or other violent offense.

Why do we do this?

Well, it's not just so we can wave our freedom-of-information flags. We think it's important for you, the reader, to know about these reports.

There are public-safety issues.

If your neighbor's car stereo is stolen, that might not be pertinent enough to write a front-page article about, but you might want to know your car might be in danger.

If someone is arrested for rape, you might want to know about that.

The Collegian also serves as a historical record for the University and Manhattan. People can look in the police reports 100 years from now and see that you were caught urinating in public.

One final note: We don't discriminate. When one of our staff members was arrested for a DUI, it went into the reports.

In Our Opinion, an editorial discussed and chosen by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board. For information on who is an editorial board member or how you can become a member, contact Sera Tank at (karolyi@ksu.edu).

Columnist deals with uncertainty, inability to focus outward

Keely SCHIELDS

I suppose I'd always thought that senioritis worked like the chicken pox: You got it once, and then you were immune.

Well, I should have known better. Although my second case was confined, of all places, to my posterior, I did indeed get the chicken pox twice.

Now I'm fighting my second bout with senioritis, and as with my history of chicken pox, this time around it's a little more focused.

Back at Goodland High School, I experienced senioritis as a constant, aching boredom. My classes didn't challenge me.

Socially, there was nothing to do but drive out in the country and get schnockered, but I didn't drink.

A lifetime of walking the straight and narrow in such a small community had trapped me in an image that really wasn't me, and I knew that as long as I remained in Goodland, I would never escape it.

I wanted out.

Coming to K-State was the best thing that had ever happened to me. Here I was finally able to be who I wanted to be.

Essentially, I wanted to have my cake and eat it too, and I did. Even though I've had more fun than was probably good for me, I've achieved a great deal of success, too.

No wonder I squirm at the thought of leaving.

Academically, I've stayed right on schedule, so that I might move swiftly and expediently into the next phase of my life, but suddenly, 21 years of age seems much too young to emerge from the nurturing community of the University.

At this point, I've ceased to know what I want my life to include once I leave it.

I mentioned earlier that college senioritis, at least for me, was more focused than the high-school strain, and without question, its focus is uncertainty. In my mind, I visualize what I'm experiencing right now as a series of concentric circles, like a target, and uncertainty is the bull's eye.

There was a time when I knew I wanted to go to graduate school, write, be literary, and someday, teach at the university level. Anymore, I just don't know. And not knowing — feeling the future as a wide-open void — is frightening.

Uncertainty is part of the future, I know. Even when you have it planned, life doesn't always follow that plan. Still, I wish someone would just step in and make that plan for me. If someone were to tell me I was needed in Siberia to write colorfully about the snow, I'd be satisfied just to have that established.

But enough about me.

If college senioritis is several concentric circles, then the outermost circle has to be self-absorption. You will have noticed that in this piece, I have blatantly abused the opinion writer's license to use first-person pronouns.

News writers aren't allowed to do this. They can't quote a source and then go on to give their thoughts about it. They certainly can't insert pieces of their lives into a regular story. For the most part, "I" doesn't belong in what they write.

It really shouldn't belong so much on the opinion page either. As an opinion writer, I really ought to be looking outward — keeping my eyes peeled, my ear to closed doors and my nose to the ground.

However, when the symptoms of senioritis have me so caught up in myself that I haven't had an opinion about anything for an entire week, I can only write about myself and hope some other uncertain seniors can sympathize.

No throwing honey mustard during 4th hour

Classroom management forces teachers to keep cool, hone reflexes

Christy LITTLE

Student discipline is not an easy task to master.

Keeping 20-plus students relatively attentive and pleasant is no mere feat. There are students with personal problems. There are students who don't feel like doing their work. There are students who can't do the work.

There are students who would do anything — do you understand me? — anything to get the attention of the girl in the front row.

Yes, classroom management is a definite challenge. My experiences the first month of student teaching were such that it was tacitly understood by my students that the only reason they did not jump out the window, smoke in class or scream at the top of their lungs was because they felt sorry for me.

Also, my classroom has no windows. That helps, too. My teachers kept a stern eye from the doorway and slowly relinquished control of class to me so that the experience was as painless as possible for all of us.

Keep in mind, though, that teachers cannot guarantee that their students will not go absolutely nuts. The group dynamics of each group, each hour and every day is an ever-changing, utterly unreliable situation. Let me tell you of one of my earlier successes.

It was fourth hour — newspaper — with loud but usually reliable students. Fourth hour was one of the first in which my teacher was comfortable leaving me alone with the students (not because of what I might do to them — the fear is always what they might do to me).

It was toward the end of the hour, and my teacher left for her mail. I was discussing the upcoming Chicago trip with Brad when two tall, lurking shadows distracted me. Chris, our die-hard soccer player, and Jon, our news editor, were lobbing a bottle of honey mustard back and forth over my head.

Let me explain that during our semi-weekly publications work nights, kind parents bring us dinner that has ranged from foreign stew with lentil beans to Pizza Hut. The honey mustard, like the three half-empty Diet Coke liters, stale Ruffles and birthday napkins, was a leftover from one of these feasts.

Any right-minded teacher would know the pleasurable distraction a bottle of honey mustard would present. It just begs, "Throw me! Spill me! Play with me!" But as a student teacher, I do not always spot these distractions right away. Any certified teacher would know not to leave honey mustard in the classroom.

Chris and Jon noted my raised eyebrow but continued to toss the bottle back and forth over my head.

"All right," I said pleasantly. "I'm pretty certain that we shouldn't be throwing honey mustard in here."

The boys persisted in throwing the bottle. They were both grinning ear to ear.

"How come, Miss Little?"

"How come?" I replied. "Because I happen to like what I'm wearing today."

"Say, is that from the Limited?" one of my girls asked.

Chris leered at me. "What are you going to do if we don't?"

That question is designed to put student teachers in panic-attack mode.

"Well, why wouldn't you?" I asked. "Surely you have something better to be doing."

They both replied, "Nope."

"Well, stop it," I said, then resumed my conversation with Brad, not moving from my vulnerable spot on the floor.

The boys continued to throw the bottle. I fumed a little. They are both especially tall — they clear at least 6 feet. I am 5 foot 6 with my best posture. I am not very formidable-looking, either. In fact, I am plain. Actually, if I ever committed murder in a crowd in broad daylight, no one would even remember what I looked like. It takes some ingenuity on my part to be threatening.

I waited a half-minute, when they were no longer believing I was paying attention (naturally, they were boring of the game). They became less careful as they lobbed the bottle back and forth, back and forth. Jon had begun a conversation with another staff member.

I reached up and snatched the bottle in mid-air.

"Hey!" they cried.

I smiled. "We don't throw honey mustard in here. Not anymore." I marched off with the bottle.

"Is that a rule, Miss Little?"

I said, "That is a rule. Do not throw honey mustard during fourth hour."

Jon, who is a sly boy, conceded the argument. "All right, Miss Little," he called as I walked to the back room to store the honey mustard.

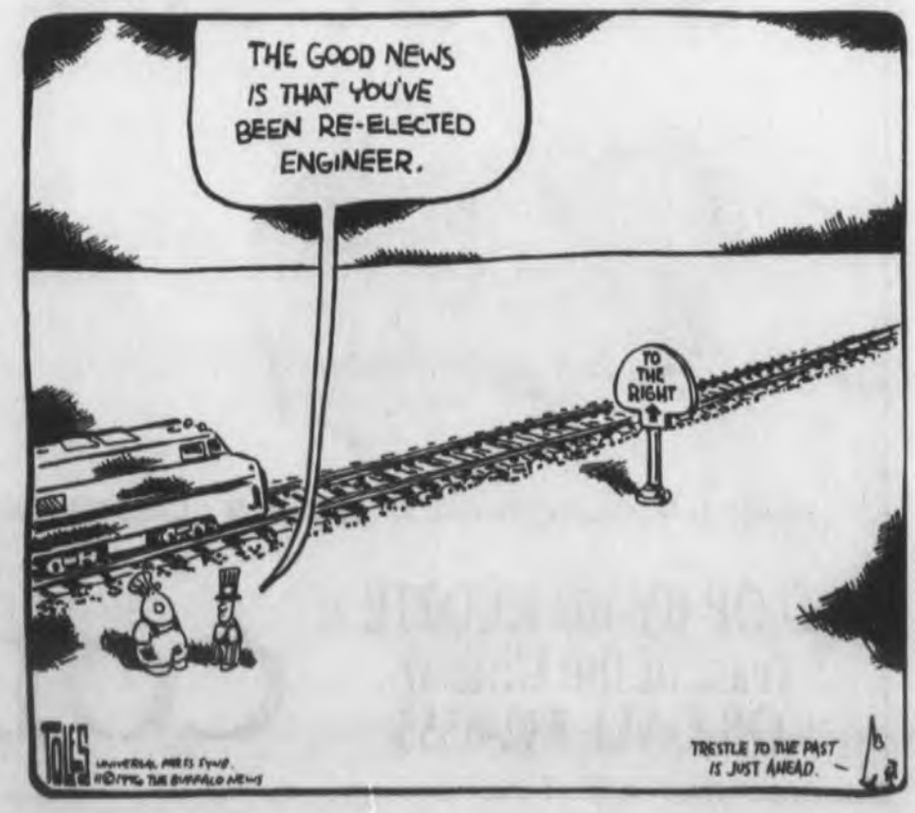
When I came back into the front room, the chalkboard caught my eye. It read, "MISS LITTLE SAYS NO THROWING HONEY MUSTARD DURING FOURTH HOUR."

I could have responded a number of ways, but I just smiled. "Thank you, Jon."

"Oh, you're welcome, Miss Little," he answered, beaming.

The bell rang, and the class scurried off to lunch.

My adviser walked back into the room with her mail. She, too, was distracted by the chalkboard. She read what Jon had written on the board.



She looked at me. "Was everything OK while I was gone?" she asked.

I smiled. "We're getting along just fine."

Keep in mind, though, that teachers cannot guarantee that their students will not go absolutely nuts. The group dynamics of each group, each hour and every day is an ever-changing, utterly unreliable situation.

A new solution to same old parking problems

Editor,

I have an opinion on the parking situation here at K-State.

There are about 3,800 spaces for students to park in, yet 5,375 students own permits. I would say there is limited parking. Is it a problem most of the time? Usually not. If you look hard enough, you can usually find a space.

But I do have a problem with not being guaranteed a space, according to Parking Regulations Handout.

How could you sell tickets to a movie and not guarantee a seat in the movie? You can't.

The same applies here at K-State with parking.

The fact is there are not enough spaces to guarantee a space to everyone. Is the solution to build more lots? Possibly, but that takes time. What then, could we do? If you look at the number of spots faculty can park in, it's 3,900. Only about 2,900 faculty have permits.

This is not as bad as it sounds. Almost 2,800 spots are general and shared by both faculty and students.

But what if we make all faculty/staff and student parking general parking?

It seems to me that would be a fairer way to allocate spaces. Why shouldn't we be treated as equals? It would help utilize sometimes-empty faculty spots where students could park.

This might not clear up the parking problem, but at least unused spaces would get used and the distribution of available spots to permit holders for both faculty and students would be closer in fairness.

First-come, first-served. That's just my opinion.

Wiren named player of the week

Wiren

Detmer

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

It's only appropriate the Big 12 offensive and defensive players of the week are Colorado's Koy Detmer and K-State's Nyle Wiren.

Both are coming off big games last weekend, and their respective teams are preparing to face each other in what is considered by many to be one of the most decisive games of the season.

K-State senior defensive end Wiren notched nine tackles, making a pair for losses, had two quarterback sacks and accounted for 16 yards in rushing losses by the Jayhawks in a 38-12 win at Kansas on Saturday.

Wiren said he thought motivation might have been the factor behind not only his performance, but that of the rest of the Wildcats' defensive unit.

"I think we came motivated more," he said. "We came out here ready to play. We just got motivated to pass rush, and that makes a world of difference."

Excitement might have been the spark, too, he said.

"Once you get people excited, people start making plays, and that's what happened today," Wiren said.

Colorado quarterback Detmer completed 27 of 47 passes for 401 yards and a school-record five touchdowns as the Buffaloes defeated Iowa State 49-42 at home.

In the process, Detmer established Colorado season records for pass attempts with 303, completions with 181 and touchdowns with 22.

He also topped Kordell Stewart's school mark of 157 completions in 1993.

Rugby isn't that violent, just tough

DANA LEHNER
staff reporter

K-State rugby team president Scott Cohorst said his sport is not as rough as one might think.

So why is it that a sport like rugby, which has so many similarities to American sports, has not been embraced readily in the United States?

"Kids grow up playing football and baseball in the States, when in other countries, they are playing rugby," Cohorst said. "People who start playing in the States are at an average age of 19 to 20 when they start. There just isn't any exposure."

> People think that it is excessively violent, because there are no pads ... . Actually it is more of a finesse game ...
> — SCOTT COHORST, K-STATE RUGBY PRESIDENT

K-State's club has existed since 1973 and made an appearance in the Sweet 16 at last year's national club tournament.

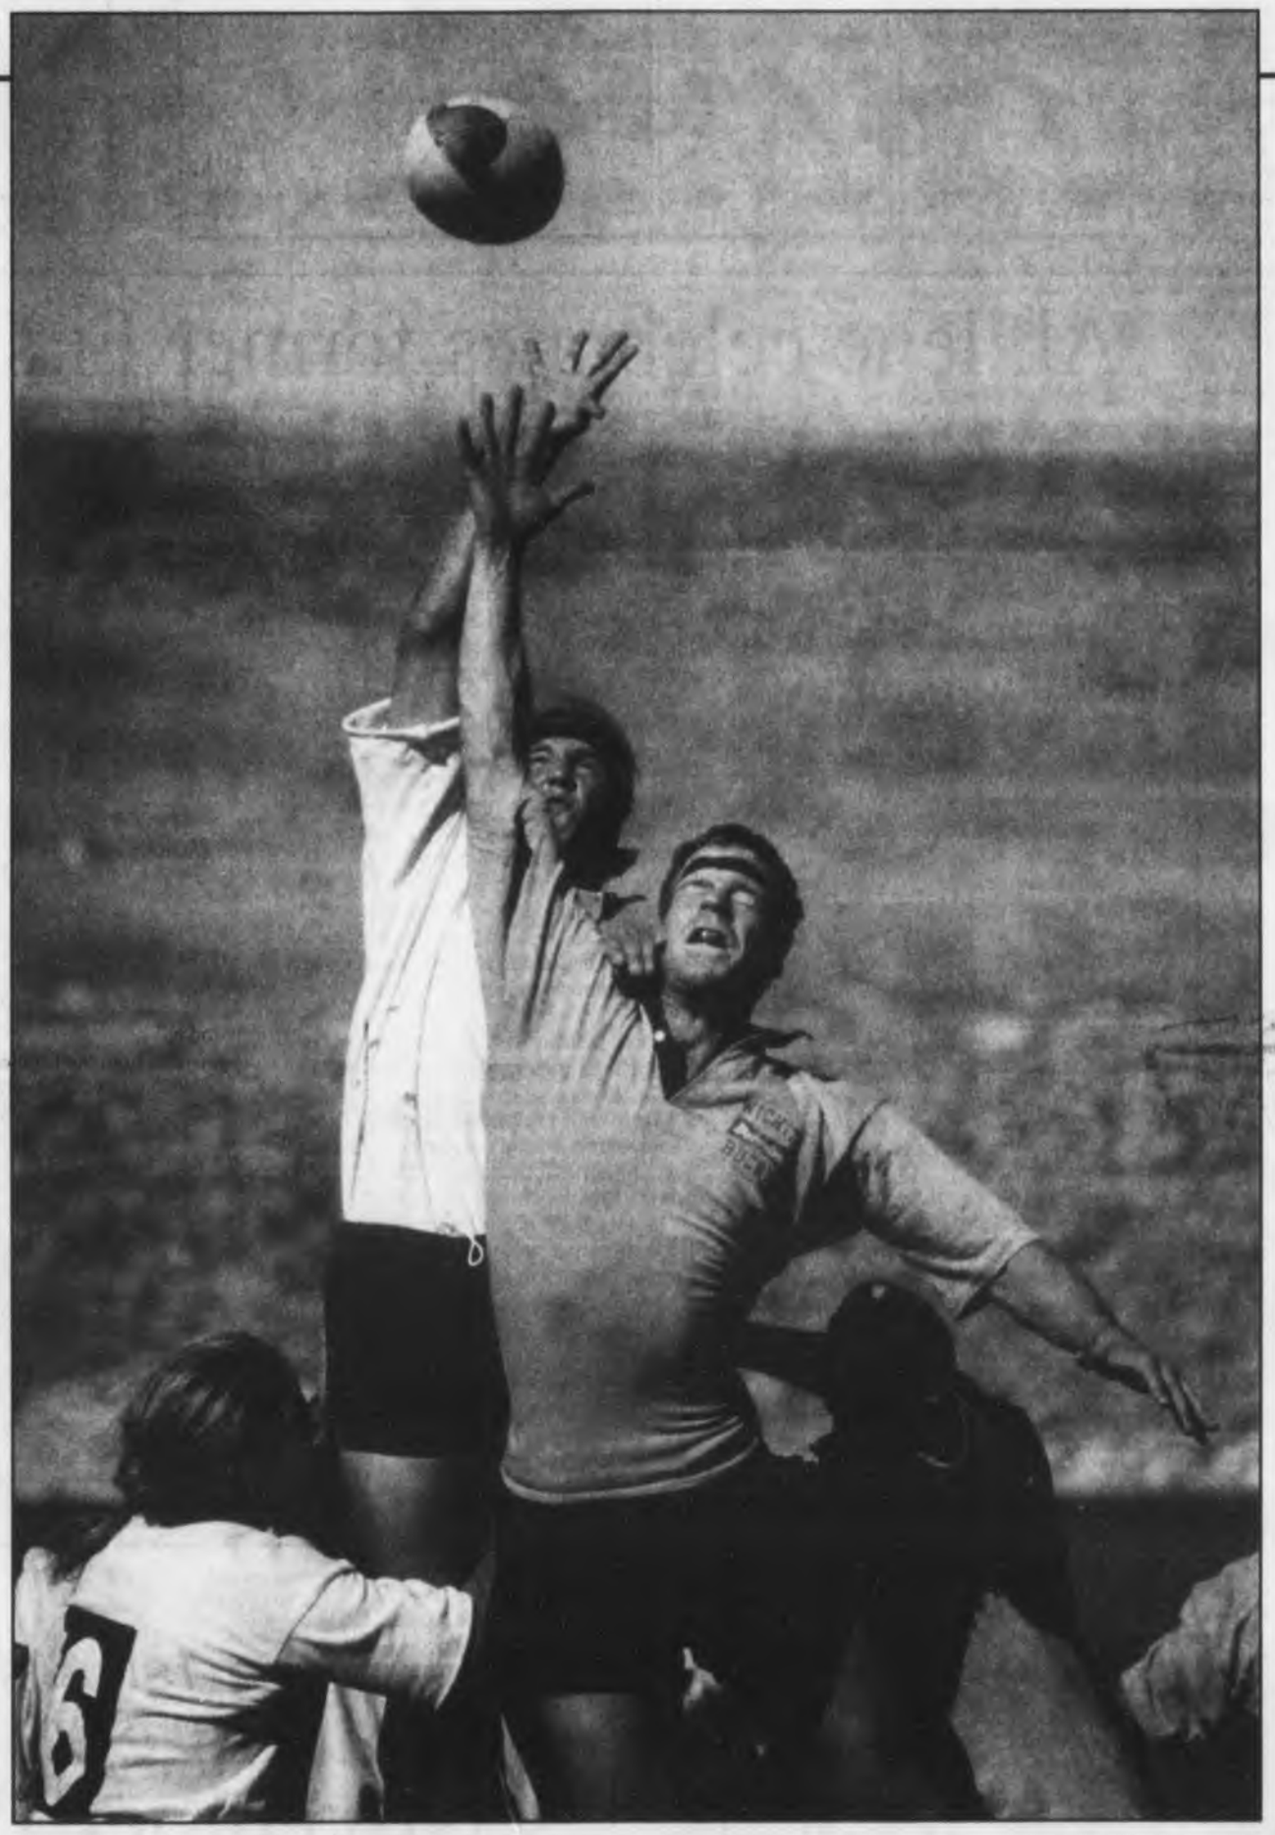
"We have a really good team for the number of people that we have," Cohorst said.

As with most club sports, rugby has its share of problems — especially a lack of players. Cohorst said this might be due to a large misconception.

"It is really not that violent," Cohorst said. "What people don't understand is that it is a very structured game and there are a lot of rules. People think that it is excessively violent, because there are no pads involved and they will get hurt. Actually, it is more of a finesse game, and it is a different type of tackling."

Rugby players are thought of as reckless head-hunters. This is true in some respects, but only on the field.

"The difference between rugby and other sports is that we hate each other on the field," Cohorst said. "As soon as you come off, it is a tight family. We really are friends with everybody we play with and against."



Rugby is also a good opportunity to continue the sporting lifestyle. Even though it is a new sport to most people, it gives opportunities to those who want to keep active in college.

"It is a really great game," Cohorst said. "Not everyone can keep playing sports when they graduate from high school, because they can't compete at an upper level like college. We give a chance to people who aren't the best athletes because they can keep playing."

K-State's rugby season includes two seasons. The first season runs from September to November. The second season will start in March and run through April. Both seasons have 12 games. The Cats' home games are held at the Tuttle Creek River Pond Area.

The next step for Cohorst and the rugby team is to get interest in the sport and the team. The key word is exposure.

"We need people to realize that rugby is not this big game of smear the queer," Cohorst said. "It's fun, and we want people to come and say, 'Hey, that looks fun.' People will come to the game and say, 'Hey, I used to wrestle in high school and play football. I can do this, too.' Rugby gives people the opportunity to participate at higher levels. We need exposure."

CU game provides writer opportunity to measure up Buffs vs. Wildcats

With all the hoopla and hysteria starting to die down from Saturday's War in the Wheat State, our beloved Wildcats must now set their sights on the Colorado Buffaloes, a squad raised on John Denver folklore and led by a coach not looking a day older than 16.

The match-up proves to be a good one, with major bowl implications on the line for each team.

While the Cats will be seeking revenge for last year's CU stomping at KSU Stadium, the Buffs are hoping to continue building back respect after an early-season loss at home to Michigan.

Now many sports fanatics will spend countless hours in ESPN chat rooms debating which school has the edge in particular match-ups on the field (wide receiver vs. cornerback, special teams, better-skilled Gatorade boy).

MY

Jon
BALMER

On the flip side, the true sports connoisseur realizes the vitally important answers are found in areas often overlooked. Yes, my Wildcat brethren (and sistren, to make sure everyone is acknowledged), the match-ups that will decide who shall prevail in Boulder are not on-field issues often pondered or bickered about.

In fact, after reading about these little ditties, you might chug a bowl of Franken-Berry, refuse to acknowledge the power of these match-ups and return to your chat line discussion of how the weight of Brian Kavanagh's jersey will affect his throwing game.

Nonetheless, they are hidden keys to unlocking the victor of the Clash in Colorado.

Without further ado, I break the seal of silence and reveal the key match-ups that will point to victory.

● Source of pigskin wisdom: While the Buffs have quite a knowledgeable steed in the teachings of John Elway, the Cats have the all-knowing advice of Johnny Kaw at their side.

Who is this Kaw fellow I speak of? The answer to this question can be found on 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue. Among the surrounding asphalt jungle stands the concrete statue of Johnny Kaw, a local legend.

Although the issue of what exactly Kaw is a legend of is relatively unknown, you must admit that an enormous statue wielding a sickle would defeat a Bronco quarterback that actually looks like a bronco (note Elway's facial expression next time he dehelmets). Kaw wins the adviser match-up big time.

● Campus critters: K-State features countless flocks of birds and a legion of nut-bearing squirrels. Colorado counters with numerous deer sightings and an enormous elk known as Earl. Advantage Buffs.

● Pregame feeding: The Coloradans' training table consists of bulk quantities of mountain berries and venison. Our Manhattan marauders feast on Grade A Kansas beef and all the dinner rolls a Powercat could crave.

Also, the players who grub in the residence dining halls receive the bonus of Yo Cream for dessert. Yes, this newly introduced concoction of yogurt and ice cream is quite an extra and enough to lead any person into pigskin warfare. While a plethora of fruit and Bambi-burgers sounds mighty tempting, I do believe K-State wins the training table title.

> While the Buffs have quite a knowledgeable steed in the teachings of John Elway, the Cats have the all-knowing advice of Johnny Kaw at their side.

● Mascot mayhem: Suppose for an instant that Willie and Rampaging Ralphie, the two symbols of university pride, were to square off in no-holds-barred, 10-round battle royale. With no disrespect to our fellow feline, Ralphie wins the title, belt and matching set of luggage.

● Coaches attire: OK, so this is an on-field battle, but it's not often debated. Plus, my sister believes this is the key issue at hand, so we'll give it a whirl.

Coach Bill Snyder weighs in with the modest Powercat-infused jacket, sweatshirt and headset. Colorado's coach Rick Neuheisel counters with a Swoosh-sponsored sweater vest, CU visor and childish grin. Now which one seems more gridironesque? Chalk up another one for K-State.

And there it is, the tell-tale story of who shall prevail once the Rocky Mountain snow has settled. From these carefully weighed issues, one can conclude that the Cats will triumph in a tightly fought showdown.

Now you may continue to waste your breath on pointless debates about quarterback talent and the size of the offensive lines, but with answers coming from such carefully researched match-ups as these, what's to discuss?

Cats receive 10 votes in preseason AP poll

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Some people out there think the K-State basketball team will be a worthy opponent this season.

Enough people that K-State is the fourth-highest ranked Big 12 team in the Associated Press preseason poll.

In the poll, released Monday, the Wildcats received 10 votes from AP writers. While the number of votes might not be many, their existence gives credence to the touting Coach Tom Asbury has given the team in the preseason.

That touting has come as a result of the size Asbury has added to the squad.

In addition to returning center Gerald Eaker, 6'11" and 240 pounds, Asbury's staff added 7'0", 260-pound Dax Jones.

At forward the Cats added 6'9", 225-pound freshman Pero Vasiljevic. In Friday's season-opening exhibition game against the NBC Camps Thunder, Vasiljevic impressed fans with his shooting range and willingness to take shots.

"I think we're getting bigger and better players," Asbury said earlier this season. "We've certainly got bigger players, and I hope they're better players."

Some AP voters apparently think they are.

MLB managers begin expansion draft talks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PHOENIX — Labor discussions took a back seat to next year's baseball expansion draft during Monday's first day of meetings of major league general managers.

Acting commissioner Bud Selig, the Milwaukee Brewers owner, had been expected to update the general managers on the sport's ongoing labor dispute with its players.

Jimmy Lee Solomon, minor-league affairs director for major league baseball, also had been scheduled to address the gathering.

But neither was present Monday, though Solomon is expected to appear on Tuesday, Boston general manager Dan Duquette said.

With nothing on the labor front to discuss, attention was turned toward the logistics of next year's expansion draft.

The Arizona Diamondbacks and Tampa Bay Devil Rays will begin play in 1998.

In addition to Solomon's expected appearance Tuesday, the general managers are expected to discuss the future of the Arizona Fall League.

Abilene celebrates former First Lady, Mamie

With the new Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, regional art has become more accessible.

If you're like me, once you get a taste of art and history, you're eager to see more along the same vein.

It's not necessary to leave town to find art and history.

The Riley County History Museum is on Claflin Road.

The focus of the museum is history and life in Riley County.

Near the museum are the Hartford House, the Randolph Jail and the Goodnow House Museum.

One of the most compelling museums is in Abilene. Abilene is the hometown of Dwight D. Eisenhower, former president of the United States. The Eisenhower Center and the Eisenhower Library are both dedicated to the memory of the general and later president, who brought the United States through World War II.

MY

Portia SISCO

This week, Abilene celebrates Mamie Eisenhower's 100th birthday. Mamie Eisenhower died Nov. 1, 1979.

Activities will begin at 8 p.m. Friday. Susan Eisenhower, Mamie Eisenhower's granddaughter, will speak about her new book, "Mrs. Ike."

Saturday the Eisenhowers' three granddaughters will give a lecture titled "The Mamie I Knew."

The former First Lady's social secretary and the curator of the White House will also assist with the lecture.

Celebration activities will include the opening of a new exhibit Saturday. Sightseers can also purchase a luncheon similar to the menu served in the White House in 1954.

For more information or tickets, contact the Eisenhower Center at (913) 263-4751.

If you have a smaller budget and you're looking for something a little closer to home, the Columbian Theatre, Museum and Art Gallery is only 15 minutes away.

The Columbian, in Wamego, is rich with a rare combination of art and history.

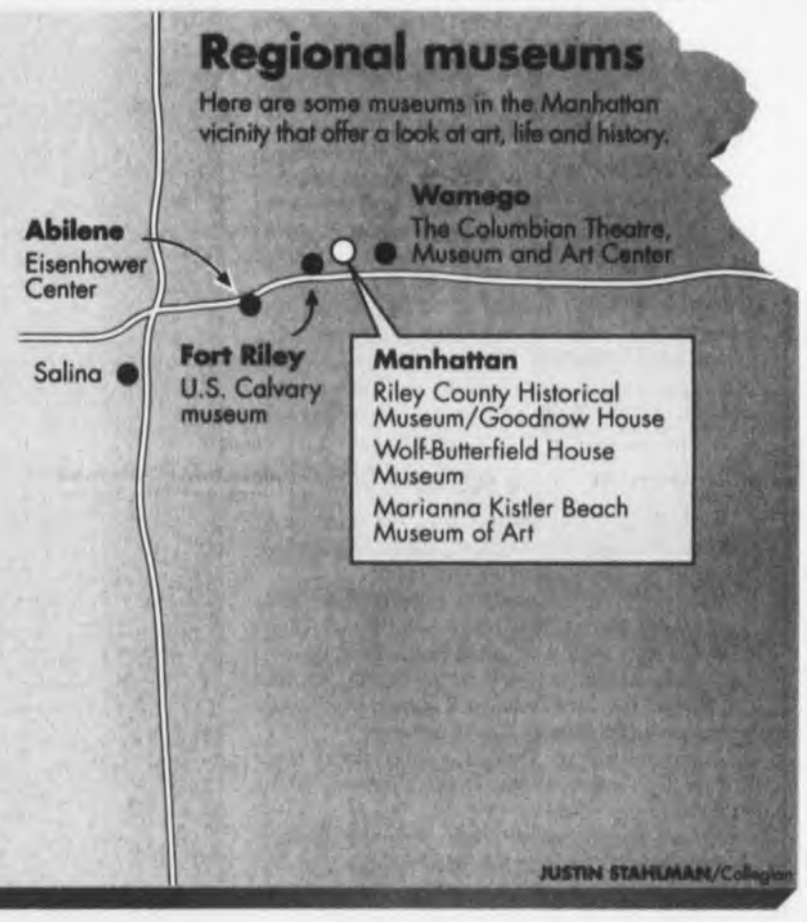
Besides the local and regional art it plays host to, the Columbian also features rare murals from the Chicago World's Fair in 1893.

These fabulous exhibits were restored by Perry Huston before the grand opening on Nov. 6, 1994.

Their value extends beyond their beauty. These murals are the only artwork that has been preserved from the 1893 Chicago World's Fair.

History buffs might be interested in the local military history preserved in the U.S. Cavalry Museum at Fort Riley.

Some of the artifacts on display include chemical-warfare equipment, cavalry uniforms and a mural of the cavalry.



The First Infantry Division Museum is another museum in Fort Riley dedicated to military history. Filled with life-sized dioramas, the displays present a clear picture of the history of the Big Red One during war and peacetime.

Artifacts include a large collection of uniforms and memorabilia.

The northeastern corner of the state is rich with museums that play host to a variety of artwork, antiques and artifacts.

Manhattan, Abilene, Wamego and Fort Riley are just a few cities in Kansas where you can find beauty and history.

From art to artifact, regional museums offer a look at art, life and history.

The Navy eventually pursued 140 harassment cases against aviators accused of accosting more than 80 women. None of the accused were court-martialed.

In addition to Simpson, Capt. Derrick Robertson is accused of trying to discharge a female soldier after sexually assaulting her, according to the documents. He is charged with telling the woman to lie about their sexual relationship, forcing her to engage in sodomy and engaging in an improper sexual relationship with the soldier.

Sgt. Nathaniel Beach is accused of defying orders to stay away from trainees while his conduct was being investigated, the documents said.

The reports did not identify the two instructors facing administrative charges, said Ed Starnes, a spokesman for the base 30 miles northeast of Baltimore.

Army investigators said they plan to interview as many as 1,000 women who were trained at the post since the beginning of 1995, a process that could take months.

"We must be careful to protect the rights of the individuals involved, but we also must get on with the process, get it right and ensure justice is done," Reimer told the Post.

lands. But these soldiers have taken inspiration from those in the past and will continue to uphold the tradition."

He said modern weaponry has changed, along with the actual duties of the military.

"We face the threats of drugs, state-sponsored terrorism, religious and secular unrest, unstable governments and threats from missiles of mass destruction," Dodson said.

"As we go about serving in this uncomfortable future, we will not be defined by equipment or by missions. It will be as it has always been, by the deeds of men and women and by the character of their service," he said.

Some veterans see the character of their service symbolized by one piece of cloth.

"See that flag over there? That's what a lot of men died for," Paul Gooch, Vietnam veteran, said. "I feel very sorry for your generation. You haven't got anything. You haven't had anything to really live for or die for or anything else. You're the first generation to come along like that."

Mayor Sydney Carlin commended the veterans of the nation and thanked them for their courageous service, but she said, "We hope in our lifetime we don't ever have to say please again."

Sexual misconduct plagues Army

> My drill sergeants are very, very helpful to us. They train us hard. They treat us as equals to the males.

> • SHEILA STANTON, ARMY PRIVATE

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT LEONARD WOOD, Mo. — In the second Army sex scandal in less than a week, three instructors at one of the nation's biggest basic-training posts faced charges Tuesday of sexual misconduct with young women recruits.

The charges were announced five days after a sex scandal broke at the military's Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland.

The three male soldiers at Fort Leonard face charges ranging from consensual intercourse to indecent assault or touching. Army regulations ban sexual relationships between commanders and subordinates. The recruits were 21 years old on average and were undergoing basic training.

The Army did not say when the charges were filed. One court-martial was to begin Tuesday; the others will be conducted within the month, it said.

A Pentagon spokesman said there was no connection between the Fort Leonard and Aberdeen cases. The Fort Leonard cases came to light before the Army set up a hotline for reports of sexual misconduct, Lt. Col. William Harkey said.

The Army did not identify the Missouri soldiers except to say all are non-commissioned officers and one or two are drill sergeants. Other allegations of misconduct at Fort Wood were also being investigated.

At the Army Ordnance Center at the Aberdeen Proving Ground, the Army last week charged four drill instructors and a captain with raping, sexually harassing or otherwise having improper relationships with at least a dozen young women recruits in their first weeks of training at Aberdeen.

The men were suspended along with 15 other instructors.

The Army said trainees at Fort Wood are told their first day on the base how to report harassment or uncomfortable situations involving other soldiers.

On Tuesday, the Army allowed reporters to speak with a group of Fort Leonard trainees who have been in the military for about six weeks. None of the women said they had felt sexual pressure or harassment.

"My drill sergeants are very, very helpful to us," said Pvt. Sheila Stanton of Frostproof, Fla. "They train us hard. They treat us as equals to the males. They've never done anything to make us feel uncomfortable."

An angry Pvt. Eric Beckham said the accusations had tarnished others.

Fort Riley training program proven to reduce harassment complaints

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT RILEY — Six sexual-harassment complaints have been filed during the past year at Fort Riley — a number characterized by one officer as low because of pro-active training at the base.

Capt. Jimmie Mister, the equal-opportunity officer at the Kansas Army base, said sexual-harassment training was provided by the Department of Defense to about 90 senior officers Sept. 21.

Mister said he also provides training for enlisted personnel to identify sexual harassment. The training covers sexless leadership, sex roles and socialization, values, attitudes and behavior.

Soldiers and officers are taught both where the line is drawn and basic human values, he said.

Fort Riley has about 9,900 soldiers.

"By training soldiers in those particular areas, it makes them conscious of behaviors," Mister said.

He said he was surprised by the revelations at Fort Aberdeen but said little will change at Fort Riley.

"Here on Fort Riley, everything we've been doing is working," he said. "All we have to do is continue with our program."

Kansas granted national park

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The state of Kansas got its first national park Monday when President Clinton signed legislation creating a tallgrass prairie preserve at the Z-Bar Ranch, but development will take several years to complete.

Although the 10,894-acre ranch near Strong City will be open to the public on an expanded basis as early as spring, officials said it would be three years before National Park Service plans will be finished.

"We are going to try to speed this process up a little bit," said Al Hutchings, assistant field director for planning and legislation in the Park Service's Omaha, Neb., office.

> This prairie is an extraordinary part of our national story and has been overlooked and undervalued for far too long.
> • NANCY KASSEBAUM, U.S. SENATOR, R-KAN.

The Z-Bar provisions were part of a crucial parks bill signed into law Monday by President Clinton. Overall, the legislation affected 41 states.

At a White House ceremony, the president said only a tiny fraction remains of the 400,000 square miles of tallgrass prairie that once covered North America.

"This bill will help restore 11,000 acres of this uniquely American landscape, with its 9-foot-tall grass and rich plant and animal life," Clinton said. "I'm pleased to say that it will also give the state of Kansas its very first national park."

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, a Kansas Republican who was instrumental in passing the bill, called the preserve a beautiful and vivid reminder of the prairie's place in American life.

"The prairie is an extraordinary part of our national story and has been overlooked and undervalued for far too long," Kassebaum said.

The government first must negotiate a cooperative agreement with the National Park Trust, a non-profit organization that will continue to own all but 180 acres of the ranch and has already partially opened the Z-Bar to the public.

Two planes collide over rural India, killing up to 351

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHARKHI DADRI, India — A Saudi jumbo jet climbing from New Delhi's airport collided with a Kazak plane coming in for landing Tuesday, creating twin fireballs that turned the sky red as dawn and scattered the bodies of up to 351 people over farmland below.

If the death toll is confirmed, the crash would be the third-deadliest in aviation history.

Wreckage dropping from the sky gouged big craters and left body parts, baggage and clothes strewn across six miles of wheat and mustard fields near the town of Charkhi Dadri, about 60 miles west of New Delhi. The first people to arrive at the scene said the dusk air was filled with an unbearable stench of burning flesh.

"I saw 60 or 70 bodies, but only about 15 were identifiable," said Manjit Singh, a 19-year-old college student who sped to the site on his motorcycle after seeing the collision from his home. The faces of the rest of the victims were horribly disfigured and charred, he said.

Rescue vehicles tried to navigate the area's poor roads, arriving at the crash site after the first curious villagers. Within a few hours, thousands of people gathered in the dark and solemnly watched the search.

"We have collected 200 bodies so far from all over the field," said Mohammed Akhil, the police officer in charge of the operations.

JUSTIN STAHLMAN/Collegian

The Saudi Arabia-bound Saudia jetliner with 312 passengers and crew members had been in the air for only seven minutes when it collided with a Kazakhstan Airlines Ilyushin-76 cargo plane, which was on a landing approach, aviation officials said.

Seventeen foreigners were on board the Saudi jetliner, including two Americans and a Briton, Press Trust of India news agency reported.

The plane arriving from Shymkent in the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan was carrying 39 people, 28 Kazakh passengers and an 11-member Russian crew.

Students demand overthrow of Zaire's prime minister

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KINSHASA, Zaire — In the underground corridors of a University of Kinshasa residence hall, hundreds of young men sleep head-to-foot on mats lining damp cement floors.

There is no running water and only sporadic electricity. The stench of overflowing toilets is tolerable only when overwhelmed by the sweet-and-sour smell of manioc leaves and pilipili peppers boiling on open fires.

Here, bright students with dreams of becoming engineers, doctors and lawyers have become leaders of a movement to overthrow the government.

The movement was provoked by ethnic Tutsi rebel attacks on eastern Zaire and anger over a government too weak to counter those attacks. But it was born in the humility of living in constant filth and hunger.

"I'm ashamed for you to see this, our villa in the hills," said Dave Tanda, a law student and protest leader. "It's each man for himself here."

The students said they want parliament to oust Prime Minister Leon Kengo wa Dondo. They said Kengo, whose mother is a Rwandan Tutsi, has been soft on Rwanda, Zaire's tiny neighbor to the east with a Tutsi-led government accused of supporting the Tutsi rebels who have taken over parts of eastern Zaire.

Thousands of students in the past two weeks have taken to the streets, often commandeering public buses and private cars.

Their violent clashes with drivers and soldiers have killed three students and one soldier.

The students had planned to march Tuesday, but the capital was calm — perhaps because university officials threatened to cancel final exams, already delayed by several months, if students didn't stay put.

NATION WORLD

• PERU EARTHQUAKE DAMAGES BUILDING, KILLS FOUR. An earthquake shook Peru at noon Tuesday, tumbling buildings, collapsing a mine shaft and killing at least four people — two of them children, according to civil defense and news reports. Some 200 people were injured in the minute-long quake, which had a preliminary magnitude of 6.4. It was followed by at least two aftershocks.

• NETANYAHU COMMITS TO FURTHER TROOP WITHDRAWAL. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is ready to meet a key Palestinian demand — a written pledge to honor all Israel-PLO agreements, an aide said Tuesday.

Netanyahu's spokesman, David Bar-Illan, said the premier also might call off a six-day trip to the United States — due to start Thursday — if progress is made in talks on Israel's much-delayed troop withdrawal from most of the West Bank city of Hebron. Yasser Arafat, however, said Tuesday that a lot remained to be done before an agreement could be signed. Israel was to have withdrawn from most of Hebron in March. But Netanyahu has delayed the pullout, citing concern for the security of the 450 Jewish settlers and seminary students who live in Hebron among 94,000 Palestinians.

• U.N. CALLS FOR END TO U.S. EMBARGO AGAINST CUBA. Citing a controversial U.S. trade law, the U.N. General Assembly Tuesday overwhelmingly approved a resolution urging the United States to end its embargo against Fidel Castro's regime. The vote was 138-3 with 24 abstentions. It was the fifth straight year such a resolution has been adopted. Last year, the General Assembly approved an anti-embargo resolution by a vote of 117 to 3, with 38 abstentions.

The resolution by the 185-member General Assembly is non-binding but reflects the widespread international opposition to U.S. policy toward Cuba, particularly the controversial Helms-Burton Act.

• 2ND MURDER VERDICT IN TALK-SHOW SLAYING. A one-time "Jenny Jones" guest was convicted Tuesday of a lesser charge of second-degree murder for fatally shooting a gay admirer who revealed his crush during a taping of the TV talk show. Jurors opted against the more serious charge of first-degree murder against Jonathan Schmitz, which would have carried an automatic life sentence without possibility of parole. Second-degree murder carries a sentence of up to life in prison. Sentencing was set for Dec. 4.

An Oakland County Circuit jury of seven men and five women deliberated all day Friday and about 2-1/2 hours Tuesday before reaching its decision.

Schmitz was charged with fatally shooting Scott Amedure three days after the two were taped for a "Jenny Jones" segment on same-sex crushes in March 1995.

• YELTSIN MAKING GOOD PROGRESS. Doctors deemed President Boris Yeltsin in quite satisfactory condition a week after quintuple heart bypass surgery. Tuesday, Yeltsin spoke by telephone from his suite at the Central Clinical Hospital with German leader Helmut Kohl, a long-time friend, and said he would consider an offer to spend time recuperating in Germany. The seven-minute chat was his first conversation with a foreign leader since surgery.

Although Yeltsin's staff has not released any pictures of the recovering president, officials said he is steadily becoming more active.

SPORTS

• HENTGEN BEATS PETTITTE FOR AL CY YOUNG AWARD. Pat Hentgen of the Toronto Blue Jays became the first player from a Canadian team to win the Cy Young Award, edging Andy Pettitte of the New York Yankees on Tuesday.

In matching the second-closest vote in the history of the American League Cy Young, Hentgen, 20-10 with a 3.22 ERA, received 16 first-place votes, nine seconds and three thirds for 110 points.

• TRAVIS LEE NAMED GOLDEN SPIKES WINNER. Travis Lee, who played first base for San Diego State and the U.S. Olympic baseball team this year, Tuesday won the 1996 Golden Spikes Award, given annually to the nation's top amateur player. Lee led the U.S. team in virtually every offensive category this summer, and was equally proficient defensively, making just two errors in 350 chances.

• BLUE KEY LEADERSHIP WEEK. K-State's Blue Key student organization is celebrating leadership this week. The organization has designated Thursday as Blue Key Leadership Appreciation Day.

"We try to promote leadership development at K-State," Angie Siefkes, co-director for the day, said.

To help celebrate and promote leadership on campus, Blue Key members will be teaching a session for the University Experience class.

Blue Key will also sponsor a luncheon for faculty.

From 5 to 6:30 Thursday evening, Blue Key will have a reception for student leaders at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"All the presidents of registered organizations on campus were invited to send some sort of representative for their organization to the the reception on Thursday," Siefkes said.

• STATE PRISON POPULATION CONTINUES TO GROW. The state's prison population continued to increase during October.

At the end of last month, the state had 7,629 inmates in its custody in prisons, work programs, county jails and at Larned State Hospital. That is 74 more than it had in custody at the end of September. The Department of Corrections reported the figures in its regular monthly newsletter to legislators, other state officials and news organizations.

The state had enough space in its corrections system for 7,790 inmates at the end of October, meaning it was 97.9 percent full.

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

JOE KORDALSKI, sophomore undecided, stuffs Collegians early Tuesday morning in the basement of Kedzie Hall.

Early-morning ritual includes stuffing papers for extra funds

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

It's 5 a.m. The humming of the news press rattles the basement of Kedzie Hall. In less than a half an hour, close to 20 students will gather to begin a quick day's work of stuffing the Collegian with advertisements.

They will stuff those little advertisements that usually end up on the floor of a classroom or cluttering up trash cans.

"The stuffing is all done by hand," Rachel Naylor, sophomore in elementary education, said.

A typical stuffing day at the Collegian begins around 5:30 a.m. and is usually through by 7 or 7:30 a.m. It all depends on the number of inserts that go into the day's paper, Joe Kordalski, sophomore undecided, said.

ODD JOBS
PART OF A CONTINUING SERIES

The working area is set up much like an assembly line. As the papers roll hot off the press, students begin stuffing the stacks of papers. Each worker grabs a stack of papers and begins the stuffing process, Kordalski said.

Once the papers are counted, stuffed and shuffled, they are ready to be tied with twine into stacks. These stacks are then passed on to another worker, whose job is to deliver the papers to their destination. A certain number of papers are delivered every day to each circulation point on campus.

Most of the student workers said the job is not too challenging.

"The job is easy. I got it because it doesn't interfere with school. It is convenient for college students, because we can make extra spending money," Kordalski said.

Stuffing wages are competitive with many student-oriented jobs in the Manhattan area.

"The pay is pretty good. It's worth it," Naylor said.

Wages are set. The workers are paid according to the number of stuffs for a specific day, not the number of hours they work, Kordalski said.

"It is quick money," Kordalski said.

For one morning's work, a stuffer receives a minimum of $10. Wages increase at a rate of $5 for any additional stuffs, Kordalski said. The most a worker can make in a day is about $20, which is for three stuffs.

This job offers flexible hours for its employees. The advertising department oversees the work done by the stuffers. It keeps a list on file of eligible workers it can call in on short notice. The department respects when students have other things to do, such as studying for a test, Kordalski said.

Basically, there is no set schedule from week to week. The Collegian advertising department contacts several workers, usually the night before the stuff.

"We just wait for a phone call. It's just whenever," Naylor said. "It's not a steady job."

Most workers found out about the stuffing positions through a friend or by word of mouth. Others saw the money-making opportunity advertised in the Collegian or on the K-State Student Union job board.

"The worst part about the job is waking up early, but in the long run, it is worth it," Kordalski said.

However, Naylor said waking up early was not a problem for her.

"When I don't work, I usually get up and go do aerobics," Naylor said.

The worst part of the job is the ink, but that is to be expected from working with newspapers, she said.

Dismissal process discussed by Faculty Senate members

JESS LOUK
staff reporter

Faculty Senate discussed faculty representation in the dismissal process for tenured professors during its meeting Tuesday.

Senate moved to have a line in section C31.5 in the faculty handbook rewritten by the Faculty Affairs Committee.

According to C31.5, tenured professors can be dismissed if they are found guilty of professional incompetence or chronic failure to perform their duties.

Three other sections were discussed in Senate. If passed, they are intended to clarify passage C31.5. The vote on these three sections was moved to December during Tuesday's Senate.

"I thought we addressed that in C31.6," said Fadi Aramouni, associate professor of foods and nutrition, of the faculty representation issue. "It's just a matter of having it in both places."

One of the sections being discussed, C31.6, says decisions on faculty competence should include input from eligible faculty.

According to a sentence in C31.5, "It is expected that departmental faculty will have input into any decisions on individual cases, if requested by the faculty member."

The Senate moved to send C31.5 back to the Faculty Affairs Committee to have the word "if" deleted and replaced with "unless."

This means there will be faculty representation involved in the dismissal process unless the faculty member being reviewed requests other faculty be excluded from the proceeding.

"It shouldn't be a decision made by a manager," James Hamilton, department head of philosophy, said. "I am a department head, and I don't want that responsibility."

C31.5 was passed into the Faculty Handbook during the 1995-96 school year as a result of the Kansas Board of Regents issuing a series of guidelines stating there should be a process to dismiss professors with low achievement.

Senate also received a presentation Tuesday evening on the Crumbling Classrooms renovation plan. Crumbling Classrooms will renovate classrooms on campus, but not labs, studios or offices.

Of all the classrooms on campus, 41 are rated poor. After renovation, only seven are expected to be rated poor.

Priorities being considered in the renovations are fire, safety and air conditioning in the classrooms. Projected enrollment in each department will help decide how the $32 million will be allocated.

City commission to recognize groups for improved local communication

SCOTT CONNER
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission moved forward on a plan to unite local neighborhood associations.

The proposal was presented to the commission at its Tuesday night work session by Diane Stoddard, assistant to the city manager.

According to the plan, local neighborhood organizations would be officially recognized by the City of Manhattan.

"The purpose of this plan is to improve communication coordination between neighborhood associations and the city," said Stoddard.

This process would also include a formation of a coalition of neighborhood organizations and a Citizens' Academy class.

According to the plan, a neighborhood coalition would consist of all the presidents of the neighborhood organizations.

This group may also serve as a tool for the city commission as a link to the organizations.

The proposed Citizens' Academy will include a series of classes to help citizens familiarize themselves with the process of city government. The class would be open to any interested citizen and would be free of charge.

City Manager Gary Greer said the proposed program emphasizes the City of Manhattan's goal to help people help themselves.

The commission also came to a consensus on a per-month residential fee to help fund the city's stormwater-management plan.

The plan is designed to help create long-term planning and management of the city's existing system.

The commission agreed to vote on a charter ordinance at its Dec. 3 meeting that would add a monthly fee of $1.10 to all Manhattan single-family residential water bills.

The revenue generated by this plan will help fund projects that were identified in the city's stormwater-management plan.

The commission previously approved a charter ordinance in February 1996 that gave it authority to raise the rate any time it deemed necessary. The ordinance was struck down after a petition was filed against it.

The commission then re-evaluated the issue and came up with a plan that would have a definite limit on the amount of the fee.

Manhattan's residents currently pay a monthly fee of 25 cents that helps fund stormwater projects.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Commanders' abuse of rank will not be tolerated in Army

Hundreds of complaints of commanding officers sexualyl harassing and raping recruits in the armed forces have been reported all over the country — six at Fort Riley.

WHY WE CARE

The Army should be commended for confronting and publicly dealing with recent sexual harrassment and rape charges.

This sexual harassment is a flagrant abuse of the power given to a military commander.

With more than 50,000 women serving in the U.S. Armed Forces, these actions need to be investigated, and the people responsible for the harassment need to be dealt with in a manner that would deter others from the same actions.

But, we think the army should be commended for its prompt investigation and public announcement of this harassment and possible rapes.

Gen. Dennis Reimer, Army chief of staff, told the Washington Post he decided to go public with the sexual harassment charges because he didn't want to be accused of a cover up.

Since the Navy's Tailhook scandal in 1991, sexual harassment in the military has caught the attention of the American public.

The complaints at Fort Riley could actually improve the Manhattan community's image of the base if the complaints are investigated and handled correctly.

Most of us see Fort Riley as that place where the soldiers come from, to try to pick up college women in Aggieville.

But if the base proves that it takes sexual harassment seriously and deals with it in a prompt and fair manner, Manhattan's image of the soldiers at Fort Riley might improve.

Perhaps if this problem is brought to the forefront, more soldiers will feel comfortable reporting their commanding officers for this inappropriate behavior, and fewer commanders would try to get away with abusing their rank.

'Hair' for 'Rent'

Broadway shows serve as the theatrical representations of 2 turbulent generations

MY

Russell FORTMEYER

Blue-hairs might have lined up for "Hello Dolly" in past years, but will they wash and rinse as enthusiastically for K-State Theatre's production of "Hair" this weekend?

For a campus, not just a city, that is downright uninterested in liberal political discourse, "Hair" is quite a choice for a student theatrical production.

Far from being unconventional, "Hair" entered the mainstream American musical canon years ago — though its perspective hasn't thoroughly penetrated Kansas, yet.

When "Hair" first opened off-Broadway in 1967, it was hardly the sort of show that revolutionizes theater and turns the country on its head.

Though, after rewrites and new songs, it reached Broadway in 1968 and became a huge success, finally closing in 1972.

It remains popular today, performed by high schools, universities and professional companies and now, K-State.

The University of Kansas is also performing "Hair" this weekend, but, hell, a trip to that campus on a Tuesday afternoon is as close to the experience of "Hair" as one might want to venture.

The show's use of rock 'n' roll music, as opposed to conventional showtunes, and progressive social messages tailored to the peace movement of the late 1960s made "Hair" a ground-breaking Broadway musical.

It's use of nudity (an integral part of the message, and sure to be a featured attraction of K-State's production) still remains an issue with current productions.

The show's freedom of speech messages landed producers in court for several non-New York productions, mainly for the defacing of the American flag and several obscenities.

You can catch up on "Hair", as I did, at (http://www-leland.stanford.edu/~toots/Hair/hair.html), which is the official "Hair" homepage.

You can even read K-State director Luke Kahlich's comments about the show on the site's bulletin board. Anyway, this is a great point of departure before seeing this weekend's performances.

It was, to say the least, one of the last Broadway shows to really have much of an affect on the country's social state (although one could easily argue "Cats" has something to do with our current trend of dumbing down.)

Until, according to the mainstream media, the new Broadway musical "Rent" hit New York last winter.

Continuing the concept of "Hair," "Rent" updates its themes to the contemporary. Instead of the Vietnam War, peace and love for all, and drugs, "Rent" has the AIDS epidemic, artistic creation and homosexual love and drugs.

Both musicals deal with unconventional characters, the alternative culture of the United States.

Unfortunately, in the decades since the debut of "Hair," Broadway has sunk into a rut of irrelevancy which overshadows "Rent."

And although "Rent" has won the Pulitzer Prize, swept the Tonys, garnered immense critical success, and is an audience sell-out, in essence it remains the lesser cousin of "Hair."

The music of "Rent," though engaging and thought-provoking (it's a great pop soundtrack album), isn't necessarily revolutionary by contemporary standards. Some might argue the drag queen, rocker, stripper, performance artist and filmmaker characters of "Rent" are a bit one-dimensional, or even stereotypes. Though, it's difficult for a Kansan to consider a drag queen a stereotype, since this phenomenon remains rare in our state.

Not to say "Rent" isn't the best thing on Broadway (and it begins touring soon). It is. But that speaks more for what else is on Broadway and less for the show itself.

Jonathan Larson, the late composer and lyricist who created "Rent," had it much easier or harder than Gerome Ragni and James Rado, who wrote the book and lyrics of "Hair" or Galt MacDermot, who wrote the music.

Those same obscenities and political statements that fueled "Hair" are passé by today's standards.

Even the homosexual relationships in "Rent" between the drag queen Angel and Tom or the performance artist Maureen and Joanne are less shocking than they are cute.

> "The media has perpetuated "Rent" as the all-encompassing story of our generation. It was an easy choice, because its the only piece of theater that dared come close. Our generational story has yet to be told. Just as the baby boomers have enjoyed retelling their story in countless incarnations for the last few decades, so, too, will we."

If one can agree to anything, the success of "Rent" is due in large part to the exuberant cast which enrages the show's hot-button themes with genuine life.

The cast, a motley, non-professional group of New Yorkers, are living the characters.

Most of them have experienced these situations, while all of us (at least from a 20-something point of view) have confronted their feelings and problems.

However, this experiential quality lacks greatly in the Midwest. New York differed radically in the 1960s when compared to Kansas. Obviously, it still does. To assume that "Hair" or "Rent" did or will appeal to a majority of Americans is too much. Contemporary theater still remains largely a high-brow pursuit; a provocation piece for the intellectual crowd.

The media has perpetuated "Rent" as the all-encompassing story of our generation. It was an easy choice, because its the only piece of theater that dared come close. Our generational story has yet to be told. Just as the baby boomers have enjoyed retelling their story in countless incarnations for the last few decades, so, too, will we.

However, as art, "Hair" and "Rent" can be recast in various contexts to pinpoint its relevancy.

When we sit in McCain Auditorium this weekend (which we all will do, right?), let's look for our story told by our friends in our production of "Hair."

What one hopes is for the important themes of love, creation and peace relative to "Hair," and "Rent," to be the effect. If these two shows prove anything, it is universal themes can appear in any color of sheep's clothing.

Trying to get the sheep dogs of the United States to sit up and notice is the director's problem.

Break out the Babs and get re-acquainted with independence

Page GETZ

I've plastered my face in mud, returned to vitamins, dusted every book I have, scrubbed even the window sills, rearranged all the furniture, and scavenged till I found every Indigo Girls tape I've ever owned.

I am absorbing the relief of post-relationship neurotica at the emotional baggage claim.

I meditate on letting go of a very over relationship, releasing its karmic aftertaste from my path.

I am breathing. I am positive. I am at peace. I am breathing. I am accepting.

I am bitter. I am vindictive. I am holding my breath. I am corrupt. I am Medea. I am a martyr without a cause.

And suddenly I realize I'm not the same person I was the last time I was single, almost two years ago.

I used to drink hot tea. I used to meditate compulsively and listen to Barbara Streisand. I have to — being Jewish I have no choice. I used to do aerobics at 3 a.m. if I couldn't sleep.

I should've known it was time to end the relationship when I started fantasizing about homework and taking mental inventory of the refrigerator during sex, or rushing to get through before "Seinfeld" started.

I should've known when I insisted on getting a dog and threatened to end the relationship if we didn't, thinking I would rather have a dog than a relationship anyway. It would be less maintenance, and I'd gain a jogging partner.

But I just didn't get it.

I should have known when the noises manifesting from the sleeping body next to me stopped being comforting and when the elbow attempting to penetrate my spine in the middle of the night no longer aroused a blanket of security. It should have aroused suspicion.

There seems to be a natural progression of mutual parasitism that manifests somewhere between that comfortable phase when you can raid their closet without asking, or howl the softer side of Sears commercials when the relationships becomes habit, but then they inevitably develop into a bad habit.

As women, most of us are conditioned to erase ourselves even in the most liberated of relationships. As women whose agendas do not peak at or even include marriage or motherhood, most heterosexual relationships are the kryptonite of our independence and freedom.

The unspoken mold of society's convoluted model of femininity is based on sacrifice — abandoning our boundaries and our schedules.

From the moment a relationship becomes "committed," (coincidentally a word to describe both entrance into an exclusive relationship and confinement in what we affectionately call the looney bin), we have to defend our needs and witness the dismissal of our assertiveness as nagging.

We have to defend why our apathy toward football or "Star Trek" has nothing to do with our biological sex and how it doesn't make us representative of an entire inferior life form called womenkind.

We are surrounded by messages of how disposable we are in filling in the status of girlfriend, (in)significant other, lover, other half, wife, old lady, etc.

My mother and her empowered, divorced friends have always been my model of the rituals of getting unhitched.

When my mother got divorced, her opinion of men was similar to mine. My impression of masculinity was based on junior high school boys. Hers were mostly based on the middle-age dating pool, mostly consisting of married men whose only tan line was around their fingers.

She lost 40 pounds, learned to do The Butt, traded her subscription to Family Circle for Cosmo, fed us frozen yogurt and popcorn for dinner, started giggling again, and invested in a picture of James Dean that covered her entire bedroom wall.

She even took on the Wichita Post Master when the mail carrier refused to deliver our mail because there were too many Morning Glories around the mailbox.

She convinced the postal guru that these flowers were the single symbol of her freedom, and she would rather fetch her own mail then cut them down. She won.

I learned the dos and don'ts of becoming reacquainted with independence early, through the compulsive trial and error of many women who sacrificed a bit of dignity in the less-than-graceful ends of divorces, dumpings and other such soul-sucking detours.

I learned that bonfires with his suits or his Nintendo games, drive-bys, sob poetry and any negotiations under the influence of PMS should be strictly prohibited.

All evidence of the relationship should be boxed in the traditional ex-box, along with any accidental sob poetry and hidden. This box can also serve as a less severe alternative if the arson compulsion arises.

Until then, I'll be investing in more mud, Mr. Clean and meditation techniques to fortify my spiritual umbilical chord. I'll be taping "Seinfeld" and obsessing contentedly about cobwebs, dust and whether the neighbors can hear Barbara Streisand's Broadway album through the door.

Union food price have increased, but the portions have decreased

Editor,

I would like to draw some attention to a few things I have noticed concerning the K-State Student Union Stateroom. I'm sure that everyone has noticed that their prices have increased three times since last semester, but has anyone noticed the other changes? Namely, the decrease in cup size?

The Union Stateroom must hope that you haven't because they are counting on our being creatures of habit and continuing to make our purchases without noticing or caring about the changes in product size or portion.

I'll admit that I am a creature of habit, and I eat practically the same meal every day. This makes it difficult for me to notice changes in other areas in the Stateroom, but I have stopped buying drinks in the Stateroom because their new cups are smaller than the original ones. They, of course, won't admit to this, but I am not a six-year-old and am not fooled by the taller glass. (General Psychology taught us how children will pick the taller glass thinking it will hold more!)

I found out today that the small French-fry bag is smaller than the original. I overheard a Stateroom employee comment that the new bags don't fit the fry scoop. I watched as this employee tried to fill my small order of fries. I was very disappointed with the lack of fries I then had on my tray. I wonder if the hamburgers are smaller?

The Stateroom should realize we are not rich yuppies who prefer to eat there instead of Burger King or McDonald's. We eat there out of convenience.

The Stateroom apologized for the third and final price increase and said that it was due to the increase in minimum wage, but Burger King was paying around $5 per hour as a starting wage before the increase in the minimum. Burger King's prices didn't increase. Burger King and McDonald's both sell the same portion sizes as the Stateroom used to and they charge less!

Winter is coming quickly and students will be more reluctant to walk to Aggieville. We should find out what is going on at the Stateroom before we give tacit agreement to their price increases and portion reductions!

High-tech association gives K-State 2 honors

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

Two K-State innovations were finalists for the Technology of the Year Award by the Silicon Prairie Technology Association at the third annual awards banquet Oct. 24.

Silicon Prairie Technology Association facilitates the economic development in highly technological areas from Columbia, Mo., to Manhattan.

The association implemented the annual competition to highlight new innovations in bioscience, consumer technology, electronics and information technology, and encourages all members to submit entries, said Ron Trewyn, interim president of the KSU Research Foundation.

"K-State applicants were identified as two of the three finalists in the general category. We were a little disappointed about not receiving first place, but our two finalists are definitely worthy of some notice," Trewyn said.

The two K-State innovations included destructive absorbent technology, based on the research of Kenneth Klabunde, distinguished professor of chemistry, and the shortflow flour mill, invented by former K-State grain science faculty member Stephen Curran.

The objective of the destructive absorbent technology is destroying hazardous substances. Small, invisible particles called nanoparticles have nontoxic properties that, when mixed with these other hazardous particles, detoxify and rid the environment of unwanted problems.

> "This dual-use technology is quite exciting. ... It has great promise."
> • RON SAMPSON
> PRESIDENT, MID-AMERICA COMMERCIALIZATION CORP.

Potential applications for the technology include civilian and defense uses. The military can use it during chemical warfare as well as destroying stockpiles of chemical weapons. It can also remediate PCB-contaminated soils and serve as a protectant in air-ventilation systems.

"This dual-use technology is quite exciting. It addresses real and critical needs for environmental protection and remediation. It has great promise," said Ron Sampson, interim president of Mid-America Commercialization Corp.

Diane Gorder, vice president of Mid-America Commercialization Corp., said the company is responsible for the marketing and commercialization of the technology that comes out of the KSU Research Foundation.

This foundation, which licenses the technologies for manufacture, helps facilitate the startup of new companies, and provides sufficient funding and supervision until the company can be independent.

"We are responsible for looking for promising technologies that come out of the University, and we work closely with the KSU Research Foundation," Gorder said.

Mid-America Commercialization Corporation has taken Nantek Inc. under its belt to guide this new company into the market. Nantek Inc. is the basis for the absorbent technology and will market this product to a variety of potential consumers.

Curran invented the only American-made patented flour mill. He made it possible to assemble a mill in a shorter amount of time and produce smaller units at a more rapid pace, Trewyn said, and the mill's modular design and low energy requirements make it ideal for use in many developing countries.

"These scholarships fund books and other things for students that cannot afford them," Scott, president of Alpha Phi Alpha, said.

Scott said this year, the fraternity wants to help high school students take the ACT exam.

"We'll pay for the students," Scott said. "Pay for students that could not afford the test.

"Also, we want to hire college students to assist in tutoring the students taking the test."

They want to raise money for all of this by hosting the Step Show, a choreographed performance of clapping, stomping and chanting involving the eight, historically black fraternities and sororities on campus, as well as other groups from around the region.

Also included in the entertainment is the musical group 112.

"They're an R&B group that will perform during the show," Scott said.

Scott said the fraternity expected 3,000 to attend.

Colorado game could be turning point

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

Last year, a berth in the Cotton Bowl was on the line when K-State headed into its season finale against Colorado. K-State, if it won, would have been invited to its first-ever New Year's Day bowl game.

But the Cats fell in the last minutes and found themselves headed instead to the Holiday Bowl.

With a win Saturday in Boulder, the Cats could find themselves in a position to go to a bowl considered more important than the Cotton Bowl.

"Nobody has knocked on our door yet," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We don't know for sure that we would go to a bowl."

Although Snyder does not want to speculate on future plans, different scenarios have been painted for the Cats.

Scenario 1: The Cats upset Colorado Saturday, then proceed to defeat Iowa State at KSU Stadium next week. Colorado upsets Nebraska Nov. 29 in Lincoln. That would leave the Cats, Buffaloes and Huskers tied for first place in the North Division with a 7-1 conference record.

The highest-ranked team in the USA Today/CNN Coaches Poll would win the tie-breaker. That could easily be K-State, and the Wildcats would be on their way to the Big 12 Championship game in St. Louis. With a win there, the Cats would be more likely to play in the Orange or Fiesta bowls.

Scenario 2: K-State sweeps its last two opponents, but the Buffaloes fail to upset Nebraska. K-State would finish at 10-1 ,while Nebraska clinches the North Division title.

There might still be hope for an Alliance bid for the Cats.

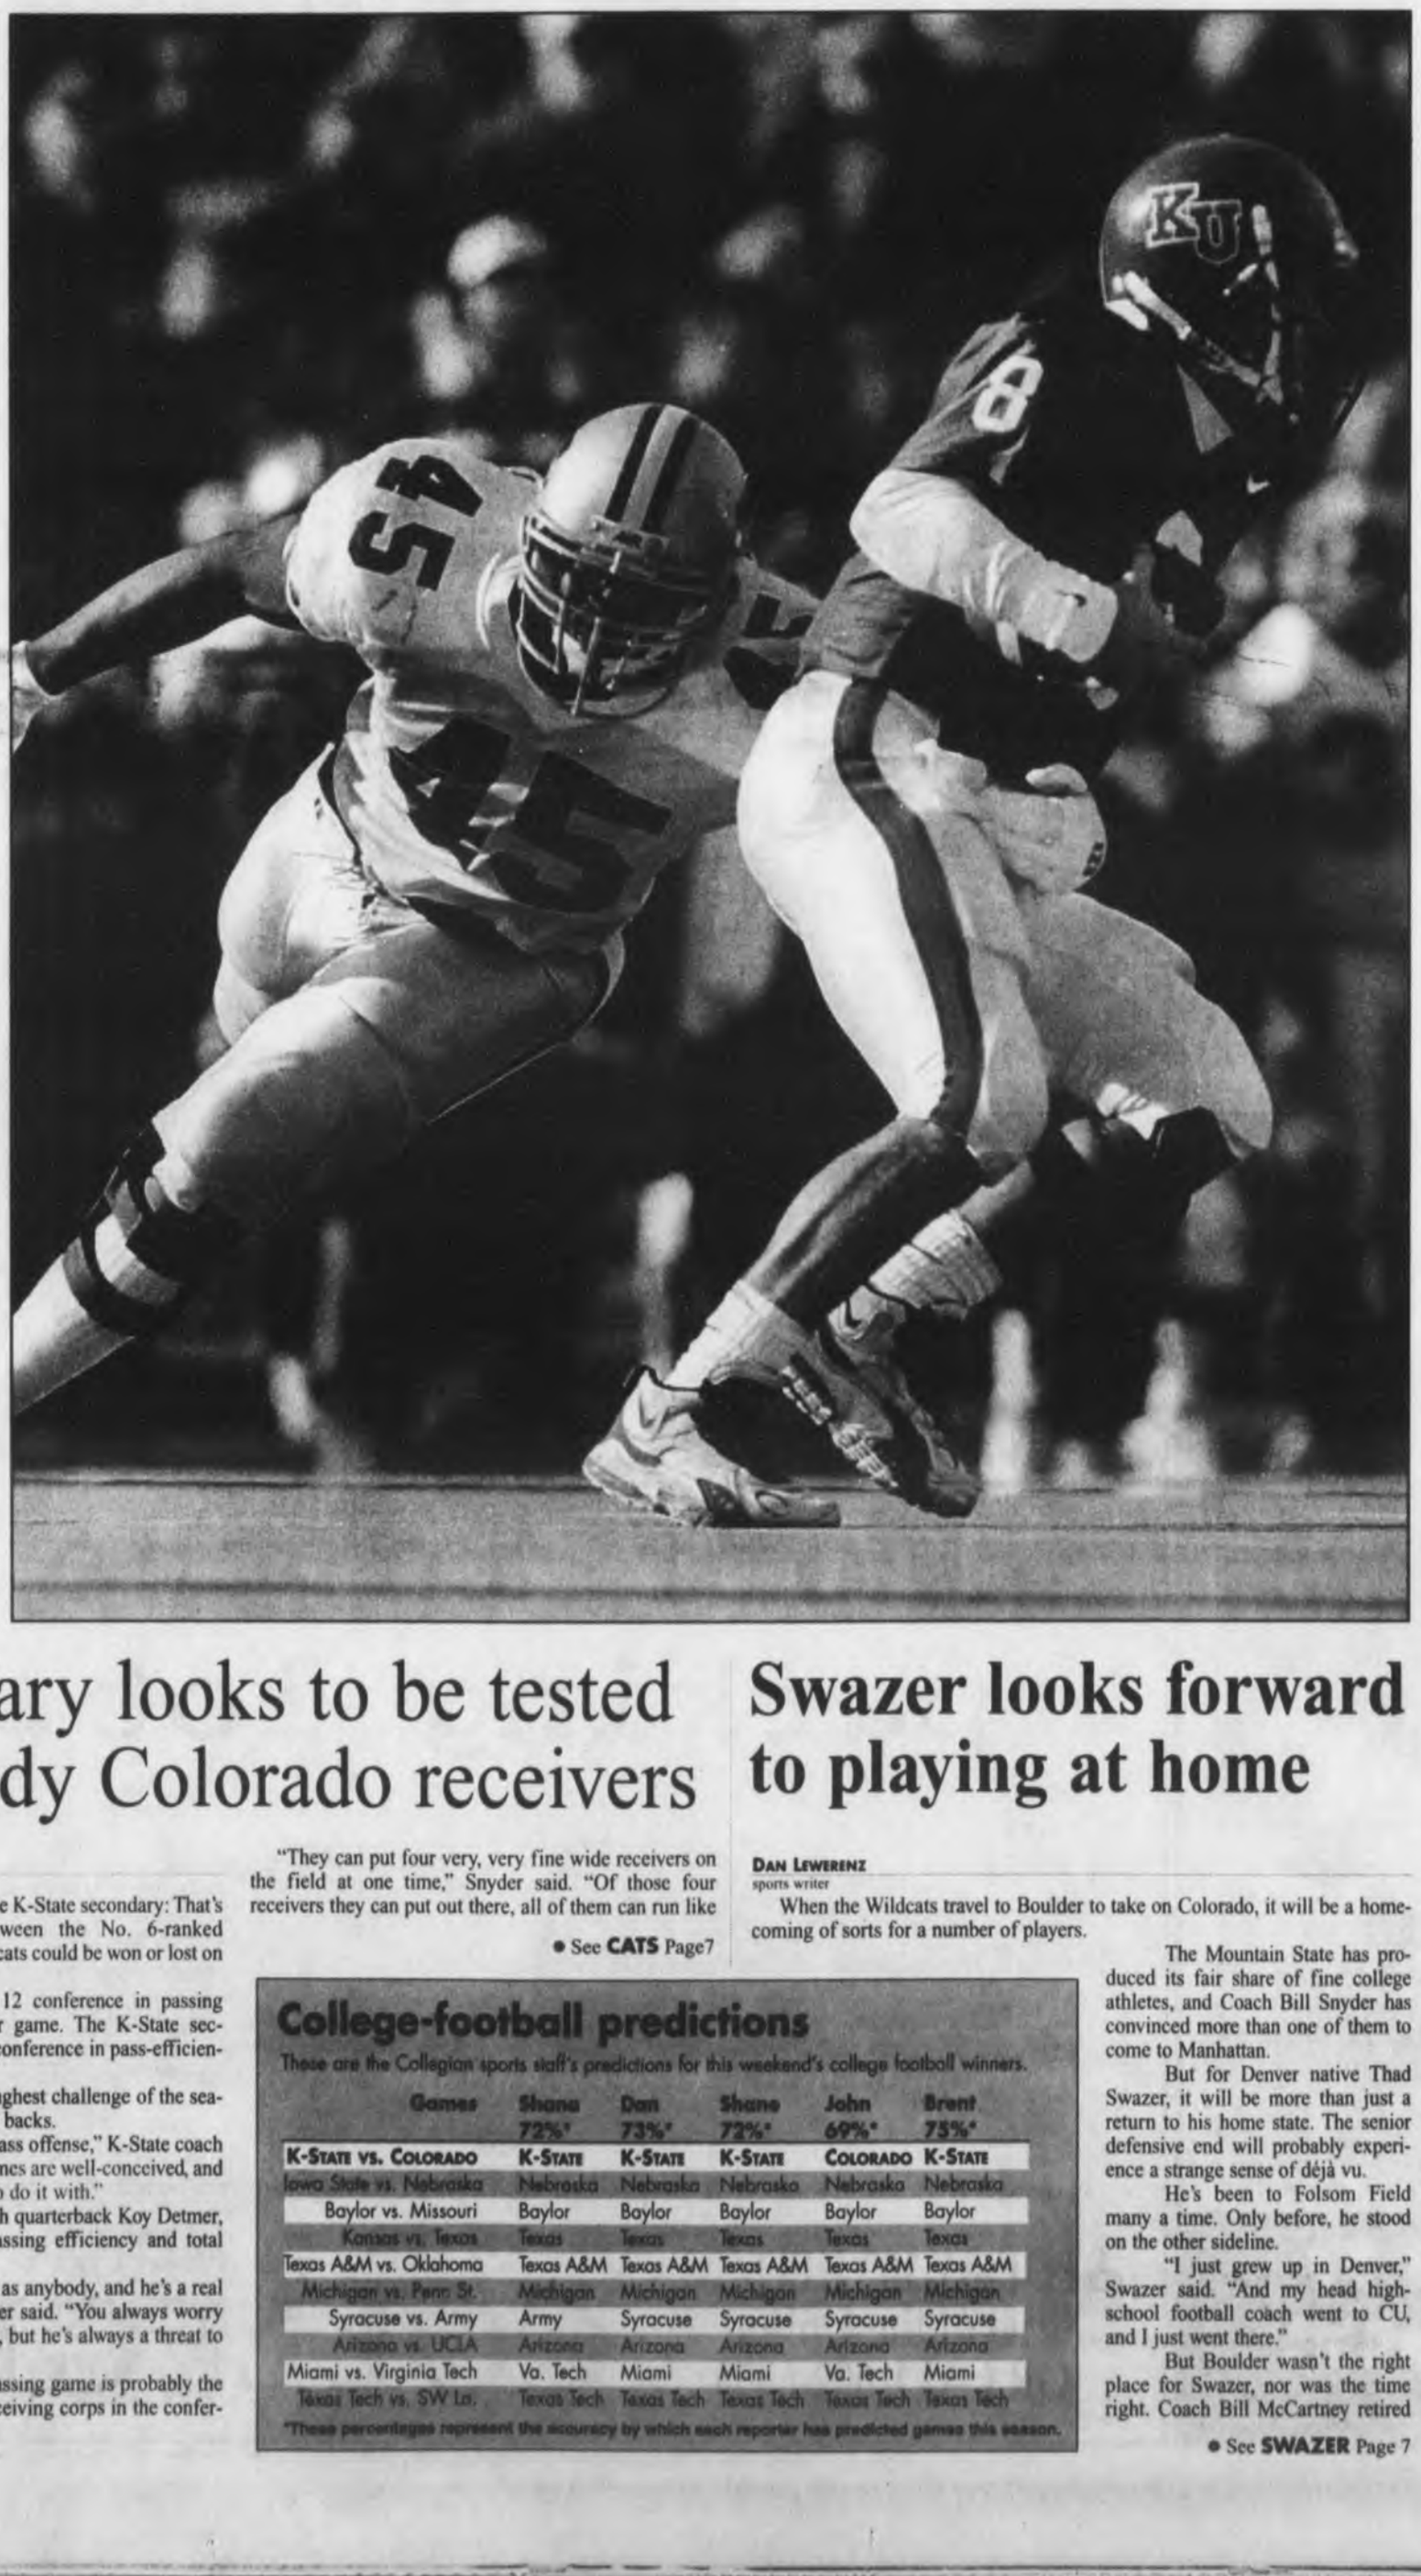
With two at-large bids in the Alliance, bowl officials would have to at least consider the Cats.

Even if Notre Dame gets an at-large bid, K-State might have a chance at the other. The Cats could be the higher-ranked team available to the alliance at 10-1. Top 10 teams Tennessee and Michigan were upset Saturday. That means K-State will battle No. 6 North Carolina (8-1), No. 10 Brigham Young (10-1), No. 11 Penn State (8-2) and No. 8 Alabama (8-1).

But even if the Cats fall to the Buffaloes, they could still have a Cotton Bowl invitation awaiting them.

Enter scenario 3: The Cats split their last two games and finish the season at 9-2. Although the Cotton Bowl gets the next pick of Big 12 teams after the Alliance, it appears the Cotton Bowl would not take the Buffaloes, who brought few fans to Dallas last year.

Is there a comfort zone, knowing that the Cats are probably headed to the Cotton Bowl?



"I don't think so," cornerback Chris Canty said. "We want the best, and anytime you can't get it, there is going to be some disappointment. We're not thinking about the Cotton Bowl."

Despite the circumstances surrounding this game, quarterback Brian Kavanagh said he is not looking at anything past the Colorado game.

"We just have to try to win these last two games and let the rest of the stuff take care of itself," he said. "I have too much to worry about without thinking about where Mom and Dad need to make reservations."

Secondary looks to be tested by speedy Colorado receivers

Colorado's receivers vs. the K-State secondary: That's how Saturday's game between the No. 6-ranked Buffaloes and the No. 9 Wildcats could be won or lost on Saturday.

Colorado leads the Big 12 conference in passing offense, with 330 yards per game. The K-State secondary is ranked first in the conference in pass-efficiency defense.

It will no doubt be the toughest challenge of the season for the K-State defensive backs.

"They have an excellent pass offense," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "Their schemes are well-conceived, and they've got great personnel to do it with."

That personnel begins with quarterback Koy Detmer, who leads the Big 12 in passing efficiency and total offense.

"He can scramble as well as anybody, and he's a real danger in that respect," Snyder said. "You always worry about him bringing it upfield, but he's always a threat to throw it at any time."

On the other end of the passing game is probably the deepest and most talented receiving corps in the conference.

"They can put four very, very fine wide receivers on the field at one time," Snyder said. "Of those four receivers they can put out there, all of them can run like

Swazer looks forward to playing at home

DAN LEWERENZ

When the Wildcats travel to Boulder to take on Colorado, it will be a homecoming of sorts for a number of players.

The Mountain State has produced its fair share of fine college athletes, and Coach Bill Snyder has convinced more than one of them to come to Manhattan.

But for Denver native Thad Swazer, it will be more than just a return to his home state. The senior defensive end will probably experience a strange sense of déjà vu.

He's been to Folsom Field many a time. Only before, he stood on the other sideline.

"I just grew up in Denver," Swazer said. "And my head high-school football coach went to CU, and I just went there."

But Boulder wasn't the right place for Swazer, nor was the time right. Coach Bill McCartney retired

Volleyball looks for 1st-ever upset, while Coleman looks magnificent Ignoring there is a basketball game this weekend, let's chat about a few other things that might be important to K-Staters this week.

● How 'bout that volleyball team?

They're doing awesome this year, aren't they, folks?

What? You don't know? You haven't seen them play yet? What's wrong with you?

I know there are many of you out there who aren't going to be in Manhappiness this weekend, as I won't be.

But for those of you who don't get the expense-paid trip or who don't have the overflowing bank accounts and are stuck here, head over to Ahearn Field House Friday and Saturday nights.

I know, there's a basketball game Friday night. But, folks, it's an exhibition game. I'm sure ole Asbury and the guys won't mind if you check out a volleyball match instead, just this once.

Why is the volleyball game so important? I'll tell you why. Nebraska is coming to town. (Gosh, that sounded a little like Santa Claus is coming to town, didn't it? Just put the music to the words, and you've got it.)

Actually, K-State almost defeated the Huskers earlier this season. In Lincoln. Took them to five games.

It was a big deal, folks. The Wildcats have never beaten the Huskers. Never. The Cats are 0-53 against the Big Red. On top of that, well, Nebraska was ranked. And they're still ranked, No. 5 to be exact.

K-State — well, we're ranked, too. No. 20. A win against the Huskers would be like K-State beating KU in basketball or the Wildcats upsetting the gridiron Huskers.

And the win is possible, especially since the Cats have home-field advantage.

So get on out there, and remember to shout, "Point, Cats!" If you don't know what that means, you definitely need to get to Ahearn.

● If you like what you see Friday night, there's a game Saturday night, too. Colorado visits the Wildcats, and it'll be looking to inflict revenge on the Cats for a loss.

● The wait-for-basketball-season refrain I heard so many times Saturday might actually have been in vain.

● On other notes, anyone catch former K-State star Andre Coleman Monday night? Playing for the San Diego Chargers, Coleman caught a beautiful Hail-Mary touchdown pass to end the first half. Not only was it his first career touchdown pass with the Chargers, but it was the 1,000th-ever Monday Night Football touchdown pass reception.

● And another Wildcat great, Chad May, just signed up to be the Arizona Cardinals' third-string quarterback. Maybe he's gotten the hint that an I'm-better-than-you attitude just doesn't make the grade in first impressions in the NFL. I wish him luck because he's a K-Stater, but I hope he represents us better than he has in the past.

● I take it many of you caught the sports editor face-off in Friday's Collegian. I just want to say thanks to those who wrote in. I knew K-Staters were classier than Jayhawks, and the e-mail responses I received proved it.

I checked out Tuesday's edition of the University Daily Kansan and saw Bill Petulla chose to pick out the worst of K-State's responses to his column and print them. Aside from a few spelling errors, I think you guys did us proud. What I thought extremely funny was the amount of mail I received from KU folks who completely agreed with me and denounced their own sports editor.

● My take on the bowl picture? Make reservations now for the Cotton Bowl. Chances are, that's where we're heading, and the longer you wait to make reservations, the more the airlines and hotels will jack up prices.

But, with a win Saturday in Boulder, I would make reservations for Tempe and Miami, also, as I just find it hard to believe the Alliance could turn the Cats down. And if Notre Dame should happen to lose this weekend, (are the football gods listening?) K-State's chances at earning an Alliance bid aren't so slim.

the wind."

Rae Carruth is the most dangerous of the Buffalo receivers. He leads the Big 12 in receiving yards per game, averaging 114 per contest. He's ranked fourth in receptions with 47 on the season.

"Obviously he's separated himself as one of the better receivers in the conference and in the nation," said cornerback Chris Canty, who will likely be responsible for covering Carruth.

"Carruth has great speed and runs good routes. The last couple of weeks, he's been making some great catches and some great plays."

Detmer's second-favorite target is Phil Savoy, who is bigger and more physical than Carruth. Savoy has 39 catches on the season for 567 yards.

However, it's the speed of the Colorado receivers that presents the biggest challenge for the Wildcats.

How does that change the game plan for the K-State secondary?

"I don't think it's the fact that you play any different. I think it's just the fact that you have to play smarter," Canty said.

"We've just got to go out and play technique-sound football, and go out and compete."

Another key for the Cats is putting pressure on the quarterback. Like most signal-callers, Detmer can devastate a defense when given too much time in the pocket.

"We've got to get a rush up front," linebacker Mark Simoneau said. "That just makes it difficult on our secondary if we don't."

K-State's ability to shut down the Buffalo air attack could be the difference between a win and a loss on Saturday.

> "I don't think it's the fact that you play any different. I think it's just the fact that you have to play smarter.
> • CHRIS CANTY
> K-STATE CORNERBACK

And Colorado coach Rick Neuheisel said he knows it.

"I think the secondary is the key to their (the wildcats') defense," he said. "They just stick them out there and say, 'You cover this guy' — and they do. It's remarkable. It really poses a lot of problems for offensive coaches. They always have one more guy than you can block because of that."

And that, Neuheisel said, is the challenge.

"It's going to be a very difficult challenge for our wide receivers," he said. "But on the other side of the coin, our wide receivers are going to say, 'Let us have a chance and see what happens.'" after that season to devote his time to his family and the Promise Keepers organization, and Rick Neuheisel took over.

"I didn't really like the coaching change, and I had some problems at Colorado, so I went to a juco for a year," Swazer said.

It was at Hutchinson Community College that Snyder found the 6'4", 250-pound defensive end, an all-American who averaged eight tackles per game.

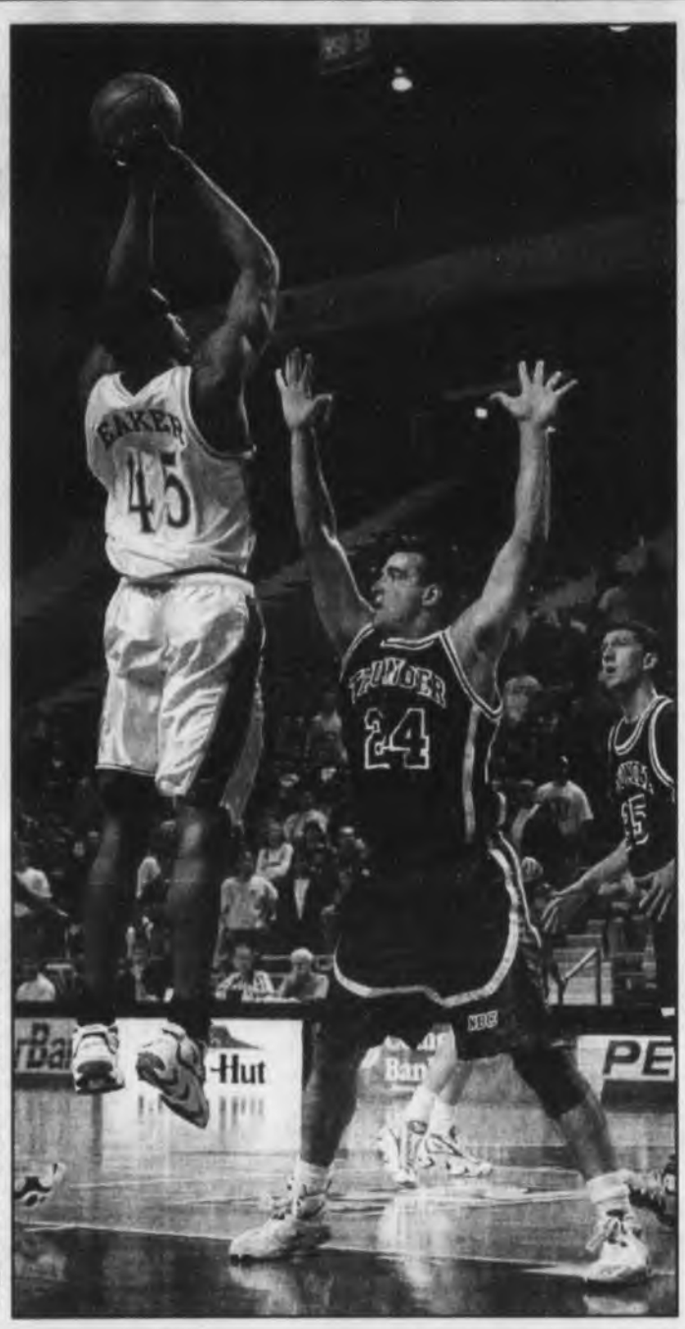
Snyder liked what he saw — and so did Swazer.

"It was where you could already see the foundation," Swazer said.

"There was something going on, and they were going to win a lot of games."

Swazer came to K-State in 1995 and had limited playing time behind Dirk Ochs. Still, Swazer managed to record two sacks and recover one fumble.

This year, he's stepped into Ochs' shoes.



In helping anchor the defensive line, Swazer has helped allay fears of a drop-off after the loss of Ochs, Tim Colston and Ray Eagle from last year's unit.

"I don't think it's down at all," Swazer said of the defensive line.

"The coaches and the team have confidence in us that we'll play our game."

But Swazer's game will be a little different in Boulder, a little sharper. He said he doesn't like to think of it that way — but it's inevitable, and he knows it.

"I don't want to say so," Swazer said, "but there'll probably be a little more emotion for me, a little more energy."

Asbury says Cats performed up to standards

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

In the aftermath of the K-State men's basketball 80-63 win against the NBC Thunder Camps Friday, not much has changed for the Wildcats.

It wasn't a win that weighs heavily on the team members' minds, but it showed Coach Tom Asbury nothing but good things.

"Everyone is performing up to or better than our expectations," Asbury said. "That was a good team we played the other night."

Nearly everyone on the team put points on the board in the win. The Wildcats were led in scoring by Shawn Rhodes with 15, followed by Mark Young with 12.

The four newcomers also left their mark. Freshman forward Pero Vasiljevic finished with nine points, sophomore guard Chris Griffin finished with eight, junior center Dax Jones finished with six, and freshman forward Josh Reid finished with four.

Asbury said playing good teams in preseason can only make the Wildcats better.

"I don't think it helps to whip teams in preseason," Asbury said.

"Sometimes you beat these touring teams 100-50, and that doesn't help anybody. I think both of our preseason teams that we play are very good teams."

Getting one game under the Wildcats' belt has had no effect on the team, Asbury said.

"It really doesn't change anything we try to do," Asbury said. "We're still trying to find some things out about our team. We're still working on some weaknesses, and we're still trying to find people to step into leadership roles."

The Wildcats' next action will be at 7 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum against the Adelaide 36ers, an Australian professional team. Tickets are $5 and can be bought at the door or during business hours at the Bramlage ticket office.

Campus botanical garden result of quarter-century of planning

JACQUELINE BONE

A community botanical garden is being constructed right here on K-State's campus.

The first phase of the KSU Gardens is in the works. The botanical garden encompasses about 12 acres of land. It will display various plants, trees, water fountains, herbs and flowers.

MORE

▶ For more information or to donate money to the KSU Gardens' funds, call Alice LeDuc at 562-1417.

The concept of the project began about 25 years ago, said Alice Le Duc, acting director of the KSU Gardens. K-State had a garden area where Bluemont and Justin halls stand. When those buildings were constructed, plans began to take shape for a new garden area.

Funds for the garden project have come from donations and from a portion of the sales-tax rebate K-State received when the University was annexed into the City of Manhattan, Le Duc said.

"We applied for and were granted a portion for the garden," Le Duc said.

The design plans for the garden project were done by students and faculty of the Department of Landscape Architecture. Plans were completed in 1992.

"The whole thing was designed in phases," Le Duc said.

The first phase includes pouring a circle sidewalk in front of the Dairy Barn caretaker's cottage. The cottage itself has been gutted and is serving as a teaching tool for interior design and construction science students.

The demolition of the interior was done by the Construction Science Student Organization in December 1994 and January 1995, Le Duc said. The interior design architecture faculty and students are designing the new interior to be constructed.

The cottage will serve as the fulcrum of the KSU Gardens, functioning as the visitor's center. It will have a gift shop, educational displays and public restrooms, she said.

The area in front of the cottage and conservatory will be alive with various plants, trees and perennial flowers, Le Duc said.

"The plant material (for the first phase) will all be donated as gifts from various nurseries," she said.

Le Duc said the roses in the rose garden west of the conservatory were donated.

"We received 170 new rosebushes from Jackson and Perkins in Medford, Ore., and Co-Operative Rose Growers of Tyler, Texas," she said.

The gardens will add a note of color and a place for relaxation. The plans will include various gardens, which will serve different purposes and display a multitude of plant life.

An amphitheater in the Veterinary Medicine Complex area will provide a place for outdoor concerts and classes. A rock outcrop will display native Kansas rocks and the plants that grow there, Le Duc said.

The commons area, to be southeast of the Veterinary Medicine Complex, will be a place for future weddings and other events needing a large garden setting to make it special.

Two lakes will be in the lawn area just to the south and west of the Veterinary Clinical Sciences Building. These areas of water will have a fountain.

A poisonous-plants garden will serve as a learning tool for veterinary students. It will be just south of the Veterinary Medical Sciences Building.

The whole KSU Gardens project has created an outlet for plant-and-garden lovers to volunteer. There are two new organizations helping to coordinate and work on the garden dream.

The Friends of the KSU Gardens asks interested parties to donate to the KSU Gardens fund. The money generated is put toward the ongoing construction of the garden.

Volunteers of the KSU Gardens have an interest in gardening and helping out with the project. This group just got started this year, Le Duc said.

"We had a good turnout," she said of its first meeting.

The KSU Gardens will offer enjoyable activities for everyone in the community. It will serve as an educational program and will implement ways for people with disabilities to enjoy gardening.

Same-sex marriages allowed at chapel despite criticism from other ministers

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

Danforth Chapel is allowing wedding bells to ring for same-sex couples. The Metropolitan Community Church of the Open Arms has performed same-sex marriages on campus at Danforth Chapel.

The Rev. Denise Leopold, pastor of the church, has presided over nine such marriages. Six of those have been between female couples, and three were between men.

Another campus minister, who did not wish to be identified, said he has performed three same-sex marriages.

Even though President Clinton passed the Defense of Marriage Act, which says states can refuse to recognize same-gender marriages, Leopold said the covenant between two individuals is more binding than the law.

"I have a marriage of convenience. My wife is a lesbian, but for her protection we got married," said John, a church member who said he wished not to be identified. "Fort Riley was going through what we call a witch hunt for homosexuals. To stop them from finding her, we got married."

John and his wife both have other partners. To keep from losing their military careers, they must live their second lives in secret.

"I have been with my male partner for four years and would marry him in a heartbeat if it were legal and accepted," John said.

Because of the military's stance on the issue, John said he and his partner are afraid to have any documents lying around.

Leopold said same-sex marriages are considered holy unions. The definition of a legal marriage is between a man and a woman, but unions and marriages are similar, she said.

"Two people come forward with their friends and families to vow to each other and to God," Leopold said. "We go through the vows; then I pronounce them lifelong partners."

Leopold said a holy union is a powerful event.

"Most weddings aren't all the same. Neither are holy unions," Leopold said. "I have seen very elaborate ceremonies with songs and a processional, the whole works. I have also presided over unions where the couple just makes a promise to each other."

John said he and his male partner consider themselves married and have the same problems any relationship does. The fact they have not had a legal ceremony doesn't mean anything to them, John said.

> "Some ministers have criticized me for performing the unions, but I don't let it get to me."
> • DENISE LEOPOLD
> PASTOR, METROPOLITAN COMMUNITY CHURCH OF THE OPEN ARMS

"It's a celebration of the life they live together and a declaration of love and a promise," Leopold said.

Leopold said she has enocuntered both criticism and support.

"Some ministers have criticized me for performing the unions, but I don't let it get to me," Leopold said. "People just put someone else down to make them feel acceptable."

Strange looks are not uncommon to Leopold, but she said she has hope for the future.

"I am always hopeful. I have seen tremendous change in the last 10 years," she said. "I have seen reconciliation and acceptance in families that I never thought I would. It's just people sharing love they have for one another."

John said time has a way of dealing with everyone — good or bad.

New CD focuses on rock band's greatest hits

PORTIA SISCO
arts and entertainment editor

Huey Lewis and the News is the heart of rock 'n' roll of the 1980s. Now all of its biggest hits are captured on a compact disc called "Time Flies ... The Best of Huey Lewis and the News."

Their simple rhythmic lyrics were the key to their success in the '80s.

The collection begins with "The Heart of Rock and Roll," an upbeat song that hit No. 6 on the billboard charts in 1984.

The song holds the telltale reminder that this band is New York through and through.

It has a strong backbeat and instruments ranging from keyboard to harmonica and saxophone.

The lyrics, though simple, still hold meaning.

The rhyme isn't forced, and the vocals are clear. Each song is story oriented.

If you ever danced around in your underwear to music as a child, it was probably to the music of this band.

"The Power of Love" is probably the most familiar of the 16 songs featured on this disc. This single topped the charts in 1985. It was also nominated for an academy award.

Anyone who ever watched "Back to the Future" will remember it as the song that Michael J. Fox lip syncs when he's trying to win the battle of the bands contest.

Huey Lewis and the News was one of the first bands to show that a instrument-oriented band can still have strong lyrics which focus on relationships.

"I Want A New Drug" was popular enough that spoof artist "Weird Al" Yankovich copied it. Yankovich's song, "I Want A New Duck" was later used in a Disney cartoon featuring Disney's bad boy, Donald Duck.

Although "I Want A New Drug" never reached the top 10 on the charts, it is one of the most widely known songs that the band produced.

A lot of the band's popularity is due to the strong vocals and guitar. Lead singer Huey Lewis has a hoarse-sounding voice.

It's reminiscent of too many late night bar fights. This is a special quality that can be found in a handful of other bands, including AC/DC.

The instrumentals are lead by guitarist Chris Hayes.

Huey Lewis and the News gave us simple, straightforward rock. The band formed at the tail end of the 1970s.

There's no question that this band is the epitome of American rock in the '80s.

This collection focuses mainly on the band's early work, which seems to be their most popular effort. From 1987 to 1994, they produced three albums.

Only one song, from the 1994 "Four Chords and Several Years Ago" album had a song that reached the top-10 list. Most of the music on this CD could probably be found on an '80s music compilation disc.

Four songs in the collection are new songs that have not been released previously, including a new single called "100 Years From Now."

Their new releases lack the powerful sound that their early music held.

In the 1990s, the band's music has fallen away from its classic niche as the all-American rock band.

This transition includes their new recording of "It's Alright," originally recorded by Curtis Mayfield. This song is sung a cappella.

This is a significant change from the hard-rock guitar instrumentals the band clung to throughout the '80s, but it highlights the fact that the group is multi-talented.

This collection is worthwhile for its stirring reminder of hard rock and strong instrumentals. Huey Lewis and the News is unforgettable.

Showing dogs gives high-school student more than trophies

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

LUCRETIA AND LINDSEY Coonrod raise and show German shorthaired pointers. Lindsey Coonrod, a ninth-grader, has been showing dogs since she was 7 years old. Last year, the two traveled to 63 dog shows across the United States.

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

Most teen-agers probably don't want to spend 24 hours a day with their moms and a bunch of dogs. But then, most teen-agers aren't like Lindsey Coonrod.

Coonrod spends entire days, weekends and sometimes weeks with her mother, Lucretia Coonrod. But they aren't alone. The Coonrods breed German shorthaired pointers and show them.

"We have gone in the van with three people and 11 dogs," Lucretia Coonrod, a research technician in the agronomy department, said. "We spend hours and hours together in the car and at the shows. Lindsey and I spend a lot of time together, and we have a really good relationship."

Lindsey Coonrod, a ninth-grade student at Manhattan High School, has been showing dogs since she was 7 years old. She and her mom travel throughout the United States, mostly the Midwest, to dog shows.

Last year the pair attended 63 dog shows. One weekend means two or three shows, depending upon what day the shows start.

"A lot of my friends don't have hobbies. I think that can get you in trouble. I'm with my mom a lot. If I have a problem, I know I can talk to her," Lindsey Coonrod said.

She vacillates between being the No. 1 and No. 2 German shorthaired pointer junior showperson in the country.

Her first contest was a mock competition to learn how to show against other children.

The child ahead of her had a dog that started jumping around and moved toward her. She just put her hand on her dog's face until the other dog settled down, Lucretia Coonrod said.

"That's something you cannot teach a child. She has a natural way with dogs," Lucretia Coonrod said. "There are people who are dog people, and there are people who are not dog people. The coolest thing about Lindsey is she is dog people."

Lindsey Coonrod has plenty of opportunity to be a dog person. She lives with 10 dogs. Of the six living in the house, four are permanent house guests. The Coonrods refer to them as the four spoiled brats.

Right now they are showing two German shorthaireds. Lucretia Coonrod's dog is Kay Dee. The dog has won more than any dog they've ever owned, she said. It just turned 2, and Lucretia Coonrod said she has big plans for showing her.

Kay Dee's brother, Cody, is Lindsey Coonrod's dog. Cody sleeps with her, and his food and water dish are in her bedroom. In the mornings, Cody comes to her.

"He loves me, but he is hers," Lucretia Coonrod said. "I had already sold him, but she wanted him for Christmas. I would not have spent that much money on her, so she had to make the effort to get him to be her dog."

Lindsey Coonrod said Cody is more like having a kid, the way she treats him. She has to be strict, but she doesn't want to be mean.

"I'm more patient with the dog than I am with most people." she said.

She showed Cody in the junior showmanship category, where the children are judged for their ability to show the dog, rather than the dog being judged. Children are put in classes by their age.

Juniors are 10-14 years old, and seniors are 14-18 years old. Lindsey Coonrod just moved up in May.

"The only ones who really stay in at this level are the ones who are really good. The ones who aren't very good with dogs drop out early," Lindsey Coonrod said. "A lot of the older kids become handler's assistants. All they do is travel from town to town and show dogs for people. They pay them very well."

When she first started showing dogs, her mother worried about her daughter losing. Now she doesn't even think about it, because her daughter knows what she is doing.

"I was never nervous," Lindsey Coonrod said. "Most people say I'm a better handler than Mom."

The hardest part of showing, for Lindsey Coonrod, is getting up early in the morning. She should be used to it. In addition to her classes at school and the dog shows, Lindsey does custodial work at the Little Apple Veterinary Clinic and sometimes works at a boarding kennel, the Wildcat Pet Resort.

All their effort with the dogs has paid off in unusually large amounts of winning for someone who has been showing for only 10 years, Lucretia Coonrod said.

"Winning makes you stay in," she said.

Both said they think they have a good chance at winning in the Westminster Dog Show, which is in February in New York City.

"We have a wonderful time. We've made friends all over the country," Lucretia Coonrod said.

"Our drill sergeant has a black mark on him because of what some people did or they did not do," said Beckham of Abilene, Texas. "It's not right."

About 25,000 soldiers pass through the Missouri base each year, making it the second largest of four posts where the Army conducts its basic training. Only Fort Jackson, S.C., is larger.

The post's main mission has been to train officers, non-commissioned officers and enlisted soldiers in engineering skills.

The Army is adding a military police school and a chemical warfare training school, which will add 5,500 people to the base by 1999.

Women make up 25-30 percent of each class of trainees.

"We have found that's an ideal mix for males and females to complete their training under ideal conditions," Brad Rose, a base spokesman, said.

When the Aberdeen scandal broke last week, the Army asked that anyone who had been a victim of sexual misconduct call a special toll-free number at the base near Baltimore. More than 2,000 calls had poured in by Monday afternoon.

Gen. John Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the Army had to assume such improper conduct was taking place elsewhere.

He said officials are looking all across the Army, particularly its training centers, to root out sexual wrongdoing.

All aboard the two planes were believed killed. There were no reports anyone on the ground died.

Hours after the crash, the crumpled fuselage of the Kazak plane rested in a field. The jet's wings had been sliced off. A few charred bodies lay on the ground.

Local district administrator T.V.S.L. Prasad said workers were trying to extricate bodies from the plane.

The U.S. pilot of a C-141 Air Force transport plane who was bringing in supplies for the U.S. Embassy in New Delhi witnessed the crash's fiery aftermath from 20,000 feet.

"We noticed out of our right-hand (side of the plane) a large cloud lit up with an orange glow from within the clouds," the 30-year-old captain told reporters in a conference call from the Indian capital.

"The glow intensity of the cloud became dimmer, and the two fireballs descended and became fireballs on the ground," said the pilot, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The total number of passengers and crew members was reported by the local news agency, which quoted civil aviation authorities, and was confirmed for the Associated Press by an airport police official.

The U.S. Embassy could not confirm that two Americans were on board; the British Foreign office said one of its citizens was believed killed.

Nine Nepalese, three Pakistanis, a Bangladeshi and a Saudi were also on the Saudi plane, which had taken off from New Delhi's Indira Gandhi International Airport.

The Indian government announced a judicial inquiry into the cause of the accident.

The weather in New Delhi was normal for this time of year. The skies were clear, albeit polluted. Smoke from fireworks set off in recent days to celebrate the Hindu holiday of Diwali had thickened the haze.

At about 6:40 p.m. local time, as the sun was setting, the Saudi plane was cleared to climb to 14,000 feet, while the Kazak aircraft was authorized to descend to 15,000 feet, said H.S. Khola, the director general of civil aviation. Suddenly, he said at a new conference, "the radar blip of both aircraft was lost."

Tuesday's crash appears to be the third-deadliest air accident ever.

Language of love in subtitles at festival

ASHLEY CELLER
staff reporter

Students can get a taste of France in Manhattan.

The Union Program Council Kaleidoscope Films committee, French American Cultural Services and Educational Aid are sponsoring the French Film Festival, which will last through Saturday in Union Forum Hall.

The festival includes five French films with English subtitles.

John Sandlin, program adviser for UPC, said the films are all relatively new, anywhere from 1 to 5 years old.

"UPC, along with French American Cultural Services and Educational Aid, put on this festival because it is important to increase awareness of French films on college campuses," Sandlin said.

This will be the second year the festival has existed and last year's festival proved to be successful, Sandlin said, so they decided to put it on this year as well.

The festival began Tuesday with "The Hairdresser's Husband." "Farinelli" will show at 8 tonight, and the festival will conclude with "La Discrete" at 9:30 p.m. Saturday.

The festival is affordable for students, with tickets on sale for $1.75. However, the Union is selling French Film Festival movie passes for $5, for those who want to see all of the films for a discount price.

"The festival gives students a chance to see wonderful films they wouldn't normally be able to see in Manhattan. Seeing these films exposes them to different ways of thinking, and all of the films are very entertaining," Sandlin said.

Clinton poised to send troops to Zaire

ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ U.S. forces would number between 3,000-4,000 in proposed multinational effort in Central Africa.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton is prepared to send about 1,000 ground troops and several thousand more support forces to Central Africa for a proposed multinational operation to feed and protect more than a million destitute refugees in Zaire.

Presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said Wednesday that Clinton made the decision after consultations with Prime Minister Jean Chretien of Canada, which will play the lead role in the international force. About a dozen other countries are expected to participate.

The U.S. forces, numbering between 3,000 and 4,000, would remain about four months and serve at all times under U.S. command. The thousand ground troops are red-bereted airborne assault troops based in Vincenza, Italy.

The U.S. forces, which could begin arriving as early as next week, would provide security at an airfield in the eastern Zaire city of Goma, a principal delivery point for humanitarian supplies. At present, the airport is under the control of Zairean rebels.

The United States also would airlift forces from other countries to the region and would provide security along a three-mile corridor from Goma to the Rwandan border. The U.S. forces also would seek the voluntary repatriation of refugees, mostly Rwandan Hutu, now in eastern Zaire.

McCurry listed several conditions before Clinton would agree to commit troops. The United States, he said, wants assurances the environment in the area will be reasonably peaceful and properly trained and equipped forces from other countries would be available. Also required is the cooperation of the countries in the region, most importantly Zaire and Rwanda.

The administration also wants participation by some African states in the multinational forces. The costs of the overall mission, McCurry said, should be borne by the participating states.

For months, the administration had ruled out use of ground troops in Central Africa but gradually dropped its opposition as the humanitarian crisis in the region continued to worsen, with predictions that tens of thousands could perish. A cholera outbreak has aggravated the situation.

Clinton has come under heavy international pressure in recent days to commit U.S. forces, but officials repeatedly expressed determination not to be stampeded into a situation that could end in chaos — with the potential significant loss of U.S. lives.

Throughout the debate, officials were haunted by memories of Somalia, where what started as a humanitarian mission was curtailed after 18 U.S. soldiers were killed in a firefight in 1993.

In Central Africa, the mostly Rwandan Hutu refugees have been threatened with starvation after being forced to flee U.N. camps in eastern Zaire following an outbreak of fighting involving both regular and guerrilla forces from Zaire and Rwanda. Only about a third of the U.S. forces would be based in Zaire.

Acknowledging that a U.S. military commitment has risks, McCurry said the American forces would have few limitations on their authorization to defend themselves. He described the rules of engagement as "very robust."

At the State Department, spokesman Glyn Davies said, "We are talking about a dangerous environment."

To minimize the possibility of U.S. casualties, the forces would not disarm militants or conduct any type of forced entry, McCurry said.

Perry calls for review of training

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Looking beyond the Army sex scandal, Defense Secretary William Perry wants the Navy and Air Force to investigate their training programs for signs of sexual harassment.

Orders for the military-wide surveys were disclosed Wednesday amid a furor about reports of rape, sexual abuse and other improper activities at several Army bases in the past week between female trainees and their male instructors or commanders.

Perry and Deputy Defense Secretary John White spoke with Navy Secretary John Dalton and Air Force Secretary Sheila Widnall in the past few days, and ordered reviews of their training procedures, a Pentagon spokesman said Wednesday.

Murder suspect to return

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SALINA — Alan White has agreed to return to this central Kansas town to face charges in the bludgeoning deaths of an 80-year-old woman, her daughter and her great-grandson.

Authorities in Kansas filed capital-murder charges Tuesday against White. He was captured Saturday in Boston shortly after he was featured on Fox Network's "America's Most Wanted" program.

SPEED

▶ After being captured because of an appearance on "America's Most Wanted," Alan White has agreed to return to Salina to face charges.

White was arraigned in court Tuesday in Boston on unrelated parole-violation charges.

He is accused in the slayings of Dolores McKim, Salina; her daughter, Carol Abercrombie of Soddy-Daisy, Tenn.; and her great-grandson, Christopher Abercrombie, Greenville, N.C.

Their bodies were found July 21 in McKim's home.

Saline County Attorney Julie McKenna charged White Tuesday with four counts of capital murder, one count of rape, one of aggravated burglary, one of felony theft, one of criminal deprivation, two of misdemeanor theft and two of criminal use of a financial card.

One of the capital-murder charges was filed because Abercrombie was raped before she was slain.

McKenna said she could not comment on the evidence against White. She said Salina authorities have up to 15 days to make arrangements for White's return to Salina.

Statehouse to become more wheelchair-accessible

JEREMY KELLEY
staff writer

Changes will be made at the Statehouse in Topeka to accommodate a wheelchair-accessible route for newly elected state representative Jeff Peterson.

"His office and the restrooms on the third and fourth floors are our main concerns right now," Richard Kern, state architect, said. "Automatic door-openers will most likely be installed in those places."

Kern said the house floor wasn't a real problem, because it already had ramps going down either side. They also proceed to the main platform.

"We have to go through and make sure that every restroom is accessible and make sure that the Statehouse is properly equipped for handicapped people," Kern said.

Peterson said he had toured the building and did not have a problem getting around.

"I have been to different places where my office may be and haven't had any problems getting around," Peterson said. "I think everything is going to work out fine."

Peterson said the state might do some small modifications but didn't expect too much work to be done.

"They have already made enough modifications to accommodate me and others who need that accessibility," he said.

Bill Growth, supervisor for design and construction, said he just received this project a few days ago and hadn't had much time to plan the project.

"The House chambers have minimum accessibility, but there is an accessible route to the west end," Growth said.

Growth said many modifications had to be made to the entire Statehouse to meet judicial standards.

"Any public office in the Statehouse needs to be accessible," Growth said. "Most of our modifications have been minor, such as changing the door hardware."

Kern said there were other officials in the building who needed these improvements, but they were scattered throughout the building.

"We have improved the Senate and are finishing up the Landon State Office Building," he said. "Hopefully in a week, we can get caught up with these other jobs and then start on the House before January comes."

Kern said officials weren't exactly sure of how much the project would cost.

"We really haven't dug into it that deep yet," he said. "It will depend on how many renovations we make."

Kern said most of the Statehouse was wheelchair-accessible.

"We are now finishing the Landon Office Building," Kern said.

"The east entrance is accessible, and then every floor is accessible and has an accessible restroom for both men and women."

Handicap-parking rules cause confusion, fines

AMY LAGRONE
staff reporter

Students must have a permit to pull into a campus handicap parking stall.

Even if they have this permit, some students have received tickets due to fallen permits and inexperienced Parking Services employees.

"I have only had the handicap placard for three months, and I have already gotten two tickets," Carolyn Hall-Tuiel, graduate student in sociology, said.

Hall-Tuiel said she recently received a ticket for $100 when the tag fell off of her mirror. She does not understand why the Parking Services employee could not look up her name in a computer and find out that she had a permit.

She received her second ticket after parking in a maintenance stall.

"There is a lack of training and education on the part of Parking Services," Hall-Tuiel said. "They have so many people working for them, some employees don't realize that we are allowed to park in the metered and maintenance spots."

Dave Amaro, assistant director of Parking Services, said it has a few new employees who are not completely trained, and they could have given the ticket. He said tickets are always taken away if mistakes are made.

Amaro said disabled students can only use the service stalls as a last resort.

There are 151 handicap stalls and 15 reserved handicap stalls on campus, so there shouldn't be many situations in which maintenance stalls need to be used, he said.

K-State has three main problems concerning handicap permits:

• SERGEANT GETS 5 MONTHS IN PRISON IN ARMY SEX SCANDAL. A drill sergeant who had sex with three female recruits got five months in prison and a bad-conduct discharge Wednesday in the first sentencing of the burgeoning Army sex scandal. Sgt. Loren Taylor, 29, pleaded guilty a day earlier of breaking the ban on sex between commanders and subordinates, having consensual sex with three female recruits and trying to have sex with another. Two other instructors at Fort Leonard Wood face similar charges. The charges were disclosed on Tuesday, five days after a sex scandal broke at the military's Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland, where four drill instructors and a captain have been charged with raping or sexually harassing at least a dozen female recruits.

• PERU EARTHQUAKE. Rescuers looking for up to 60 miners trapped in a gold mine found two bodies and three survivors Wednesday, and said they thought others remained trapped by a powerful earthquake that rattled southern Peru. Eleven people have been confirmed dead and 560 were injured, civil defense Gen. Julio Alcocerhe said. Earlier government statements had put the figures at 15 dead and 700 hurt.

• OFFICER CLEARED IN RIOT CASE. Despite appeals for calm, a police officer was shot Wednesday evening as blacks responded to a grand jury's refusal to indict a white officer in the slaying of a black motorist. The shooting happened hours after the grand jury's decision was released, in the same St. Petersburg, Fla. neighborhood where black youths erupted in violence last month. No further details were immediately available.

• SECURITY COUNCIL OPENING TALKS ON NEXT SECRETARY GENERAL. The United States' battle to oust Boutros Boutros-Ghali begins in earnest next week, when the Security Council opens consultations on selecting the next U.N. secretary-general. In a letter Tuesday to the Security Council, Egyptian Ambassador Nabil Elaraby formally nominated Boutros-Ghali for re-election, citing endorsements by African and Arab countries. The Clinton administration opposes a second term for Boutros-Ghali, saying he has been lukewarm on reforming the United Nations. African countries and their allies on the council — China, France and Russia — support a second term for the Egyptian diplomat, whose first five-year term expires Dec. 31.

• HAITI REQUESTS EXTENSION OF U.N. PEACEKEEPING MISSION. President Rene Preval said Wednesday that he has asked the United Nations to extend its peacekeeping mission through July to give Haiti's new police force more training. The mission's current mandate ends Nov. 30. Some 1,200 U.N. peacekeeping troops are in the Port-au-Prince metropolitan area. Another 300 U.N. civilian police officers also are assigned to Haiti.

• BHUTTO LAUNCHES LEGAL BATTLE TO RETURN TO POWER. Ousted Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto launched a legal battle Wednesday to return her government to power, a week after her second term in office came to an abrupt and inglorious end. Bhutto challenged the president's constitutional authority to dismiss her government. President Farooq Leghari dismissed Bhutto and dissolved her government Nov. 5. She accused him of acting out of personal spite.

• BOSNIA DEPLOYMENT. A national guard unit based out of this south-central Kansas town is headed to Bosnia. The meteorological detachment of the 35th Division Artillery left Hutchinson Wednesday for training at Fort Sill, Okla. The day after Thanksgiving, the 16 members of the unit will fly to Germany for more training. They will be sent to Bosnia sometime later this year. The group provides weather data to the artillery units in the field. The artillery units use the information to determine how to aim artillery.

SPORTS

• INDIANS GET MATT WILLIAMS IN TRADE WITH GIANTS. Matt Williams, one of the top home-run hitters in baseball, was traded by the San Francisco Giants to the Cleveland Indians Wednesday for infielders Jeff Kent and Jose Vizcaino and reliever Julian Tavarez. Williams has 247 homers in 10 years as the Giants' third baseman, including 38 in the strike-shortened 1994 season. But he has missed large portions of the last two seasons with injuries.

• FIVE ACCUSED IN RAPE OF TEEN. Four Grambling football players were suspended from the team Wednesday pending an investigation into an accusation that they and a fifth student raped a 14-year-old girl. All five were being held in the Lincoln Parish Detention Center Wednesday with bond set at $50,000 each. The men were arrested Tuesday, and each was charged with one count of forcible rape and one count of aggravated oral sexual battery.

• EVANS FORMALLY SIGNS LETTER OF INTENT AT WICHITA STATE. Standout Wichita prep player Maurice Evans formally signed his national letter of intent Wednesday to stay home and play at Wichita State. Evans had announced his decision last week. He chose the Shockers over Kansas and Oklahoma State. Evans, a 6'5" swingman, averaged 20.6 points and 9.1 rebounds per game last season at Collegiate High School.

• Due to a reporter's error, Wednesday's Collegian incorrectly reported the men's next basketball game will be at 7 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum against the Adelaide 36ers. The story should have said the game is Friday evening. The Collegian regrets this error.

Woman of the year

Gamma Phi wins award, honored by Delta Chi

BY DEBBIE HOLLIS

Real. Optimistic. Dedicated.

Those are three words Maria Stecklein, senior in civil engineering, used to describe herself during her interview for Sorority Woman of the Year.

Stecklein was selected by members of the Delta Chi fraternity to be this year's recipient.

This is the second year in the past three years that Delta Chi has sponsored the program.

"There's a lot of stereotypes of the sorority woman — that they're not smart or very clueless," said Kevin Birdsell, senior in secondary education and selection committee chairman. "This program reverses that and shows that there are many who are very smart."

Stecklein's accomplishments include leadership positions in her sorority, Gamma Phi Beta, member of Mortar Board and Order of Omega, and belonging to two engineering honoraries, Chi Epsilon and Tau Beta Pi.

Stecklein has also been involved in community service. Last year she went to Chicago as part of the spring break alternative trip sponsored by St. Isidore's University Chapel. She worked in a soup kitchen and homeless shelter there.

One question candidates were asked during the interview was how they would improve the greek system.

"I feel that most interaction in the greek community is in the form of competition," Stecklein said. "If we would have a more concentrated group effort for public relations instead of individual efforts it'd be much more effective."

Some sororities chose to participate as a house and nominate candidates. Other sororities, such as Kappa Kappa Gamma, left it up to individual members to apply.

All applications for Sorority Woman of the Year were accompanied with a $15 entry fee, which went to Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc.

"I did it because I saw it was going to Big Brothers and Big Sisters," Kelly Flynn, Kappa and sophomore in mass communications, said. "I see that as an important community service here in Manhattan."

Delta Chi plans to make this an annual philanthropy.

"Hopefully next year, we'll have almost all of the sororities participate," Birdsell said.

Stecklein said the program is promising.

"I think if they continue, which I hope they do, it'll be more well known and become more of an honor every year," Stecklein said.

Stecklein received an individual trophy and gift certificates from local merchants. She will also be recognized at Delta Chi's winter formal Saturday. The Gamma Phis will receive a traveling trophy to display in her honor.

Unexpected library bills cause concern for students with late books

LILLIAN BEEBE
staff writer

A K-State graduate student received a $737 surprise bill in the mail Tuesday from Farrell Library.

Neil Miller, graduate student in entomology, had 15 books checked out from Farrell for a semester. He said he had renewed them in September.

Graduate students can check out books from Farrell for a semester, but they must be renewed each semester, Kathleen Wisneski, head of the circulation unit, said. Undergraduates can only check out books for 30 days.

The renewal date for graduate students was Sept. 15, she said.

Courtesy notices are sent out three days after the book is past due, Wisneski said. A second courtesy notice is sent after 21 days.

For books, the fine is 25 cents per day, and the maximum fine is $8.75.

After 42 days, the billing system automatically issues a bill to cover the replacement cost of overdue materials, Wisneski said.

Students who receive replacement bills and still have the books do not have to pay replacement and processing fees if they return the books, Wisneski said. All the students are responsible for once they return the books is the fines.

"If there is a problem with something, we don't know it unless you come in and talk to us," Wisneski said.

Miller said he called the circulation desk Tuesday night, and he said he was told several other people were in the same position as he was in.

"I imagine there are a few graduate students having heart attacks," he said.

Miller said the circulation department told him some people were not listed as being enrolled.

Wisneski said that is highly unlikely. Farrell communicates with Enrollment Services when someone is delinquent, and the library blocks the person's enrollment or graduation.

Students have about two weeks to respond from the time they receive a replacement bill until their graduation or enrollment is blocked, she said. When enrollment is blocked, it also blocks any financial aid.

Periodicals and reference materials are available on loan for shorter periods of time, and students should be aware of this, Wisneski said.

Information on library circulation polices can be obtained at the circulation desk in Farrell.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Abusing handicap parking permits takes parking away from those who need them

Driving through a vehicle-congested campus day in and day out might prove to be a frustrating experience.

We know. We've been there.

WHY WE CARE

While driving around campus for a parking space is aggravating, using a handicap permit or parking spot is inconsiderate and illegal.

So, you might try to come up with schemes to fool Parking Services. Maybe you come to campus after 5 p.m. and park in the faculty stalls. Maybe you forget to plug your meter and try to convince the parking appeals board that the meter was broken.

Maybe your roommate broke his foot three months ago and has a handicap tag for his car. His foot has since healed and the tag is just sitting on the kitchen table with two months until it expires.

Tempting, isn't it?

Stop.

Not only is misusing a handicap permit illegal and punishable with a fine of up to $2,500, but you're taking that spot away from people who really need it.

But fraudulent use of the permits is not the only problem with the handicap stalls. There are also those who — perhaps with no ill intention — pull into a handicap spot for just a minute. Maybe they leave their hazard lights on to indicate they will be back from their errand in a minute.

Even that is punishable with a $100 ticket, and your car can be towed.

But think about it. While you're in running your errand for three or four minutes, there could be people who really need that spot driving by, but having to find another stall.

Use some common courtesy, folks.

If you legitimately had a pass for whatever reason, don't use it longer than you need it — even if it hasn't expired yet. Once your foot is healed, you no longer need to be parking two feet away from the building. But someone else does.

And if you have a handicap parking pass and still need it but no spaces are available, you can use the service stalls as a last resort. This is OK, and you will not get towed.

We all understand there's a parking problem. Trying to get around it is something we've all tried, but make sure you're not hurting someone else when you do it.

Maintaining Wildcat Walk, fake IDs and parking remain significant campus concerns for Hansen-Otto cabinet

Editor's note: This is the third in a series of columns written by members of the Hansen-Otto cabinet to get students more involved in their government.

Greetings! My name is Jason Oblander. I am the parking and campus safety director for the student body president's cabinet. This is one of several articles from cabinet members to let the students know what Student Governing Association is doing.

As parking and campus safety director (I cannot say that title and keep a straight face) I help promote campus safety in a number of ways. Many of you may have read the articles in the paper about the attorney general's task force, which is called the Campus Awareness Makes for Protection and Ultimate Safety.

I represent Student Body President Chris Hansen at those monthly meetings.

So far, I have learned what other colleges and universities in Kansas are doing to promote safety on their campuses.

We are also considering passing resolutions in support of certain actions by the Kansas Legislature in its upcoming session. One of these proposals would allow campus police at the Kansas Board of Regents universities to work with local police departments in order to share jurisdiction over certain areas surrounding the universities.

Another proposal calls for an increase in the penalty when someone uses false ID to buy alcohol. A third proposal would make more information available on parolees or restrict them from attending college for up to one year after release.

I am also working to ensure that the Wildcat Walk Escort Service is functioning well and has the resources it needs. For those of you who are not familiar with the escort service, it is not to help students find dates.

It was established to provide peace of mind to those students and faculty who do not feel safe walking on campus by themselves. To use the service, just call 395-SAFE, and a pair of escorts will be sent out to escort you wherever you need to go up to four blocks around campus. The system is up and going, but it has not received many calls. Do not hesitate to call for an escort. That is why we have the service.

I have also been working on increasing the number of security cameras on campus. I have been working very closely with Student Body Vice President Aaron Otto. This is a high priority for both Hansen and Otto.

It was also one of the main issues that they ran on during their campaign last semester.

We are currently pushing for using funds from the City/University Tax Fund to purchase these cameras.

This fund is generated from the sales tax collected on items purchased on campus. I cannot think of a better way to spend this money. Purchasing cameras will benefit both the students and community members who come on campus for a variety of reasons.

These cameras will deter would-be criminals from vandalizing cars or attacking people. It will also provide valuable evidence for law-enforcement officers should any crime take place on campus.

As for the parking aspect of my position, I serve on both the Parking Council and the Senate parking and campus safety committee. The Parking Council sets the parking rules and regulations for K-State.

The Senate committee is undertaking a large project to educate students on safety issues. The details of this are still being worked out, but look for information and announcements in the Collegian about upcoming presentations.

Parking is, and always will be, an important issue on college campuses. There are no easy solutions to this problem. Dating back to at least 1941, the parking problem has been with us.

Every year, the same solutions are offered. These include building a parking garage or establishing a shuttle service. They are debated in numerous committees with no final action ever taken. However, we are still looking into a variety of ways of working with the administration and community to alleviate the problem in any way we can.

If anyone has questions, concerns or comments about parking or campus safety, feel free to contact me.

The best way is by e-mail. My address is (rjasono@ksu.edu). If you would prefer to call me, my number is 395-2478. I look forward to hearing from anyone about these issues.

Vietnam remembered through the eyes of Generation X

MY

Erin
MANSUR-SMITH

Every Sunday for seven weeks this semester, I have been papering walls with the names of dead men.

They are the names of those listed on the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C. Luke Kahlich, director of the musical "Hair," ran off 100 pages a week. The cast would then tape them three at a time to the walls of our rehearsal space.

The purpose of the exercise was to show us a little about the conflict "Hair" was written to represent. The story is of Claude Hooper Bukowski and his struggle to decide whether or not to go to Vietnam in 1968.

Hanging those names was a way of showing us a little something about the nature of his battle and the time we were singing and talking about. Not just about the tie-dye and the flowers and the peace symbols, but about the body count rolling around at the end of the evening news. About the fact that once, the names of Khe Sanh, Saigon and Kent State weren't ones that were said with ease.

It was about the definition of patriotism. It was about choices so many people had to make then and have to live with now. It was about many, many dead boys.

And it was effective.

I auditioned for this show because I remember the war. Not like my parents and other members of their generation who stood on the front lines both there and here. Their memories are of rice paddies and sniper fire, protesting and organizing. Their heroes were Stokely Carmichael, Abbie Hoffman and Timothy Leary.

They remember themselves as the generation that fought the war and stopped it.

My memories of the war are the ones of those who came after it. I remember the statistics flashed up after the news. I am old enough to remember the fall of Saigon and the look on so many veterans' faces when someone called it the sign that we had finally lost the war.

I am one of those who witnessed the clash of our parents' idealism with the reality of Vietnam. I watched their music become commercials. I watched their heroes kill themselves, change their names and move away or go on the lecture circuit. I watched their chants for peace become punch lines as they fought with their own anger, pain and disappointment.

I am one of the those who watches shadows pass across our uncles' and fathers' faces when they hear the national anthem.

Many of the people in our cast are too young to remember the war. They were born after the fall of Saigon, and because of that people may think they know nothing of the conflict that shaped the American consciousness of the 1960s and early 1970s than what they see in between sound bites and psychedelic flashes of color on MTV.

People might think we cannot begin to comprehend the scope of influence Vietnam had on the time or the society well enough to bring a life to this musical.

People might even feel a little sorry for us.

The two generations might not have the same images or memories of Vietnam. We might not have buried your dead. We might not have been beaten by police or kicked out of the house because we protested.

We have only read the names of the men and women you knew and loved, but we learned from the Vietnam you remembered nonetheless.

We are the ones who register when we turn 18, carrying the little cards in our wallets like lottery tickets. Now we are the ones who hold our breath, our brothers and friends close when we watch the evening news.

We are the ones who read the names and know well and very well that, by the luck of a birth date, we or someone we love could end up in some jungle or desert we couldn't find on a map, hunkered down and waiting to face an enemy.

We learned because of Vietnam that idealism alone cannot stop a war, but that hope tempered with social action can make a society stand up and take notice of itself.

I know, periodically, we must be reminded of that so Vietnam never happens again. I auditioned for "Hair" because I saw it as a way to do just that.

I have new memories of the war now. I'll never think of Vietnam again without seeing the faces of Tyler, Joel, Justin and the other men of the cast holding their draft notices in their hands.

I'll never be able to think of it without hearing Jill, Katie or Diana shouting for peace.

And I'll never think of war, any war, without seeing all those gleaming sheets of paper, plastered along a concrete wall, daring us all to forget.

Go get that man

New book tells how a woman can find the man of her dreams

MY

Nikola Maria
ZYTKOW

I thought I knew the rules — the rules of love, that is.

Stay away from the following: men on parole, men older than Daddy and guys whose wallets are stuffed not with credit cards but pictures of their little ones.

Yes, I thought these nifty guidelines were all I needed to weed out the bad apples and thrust me into the arms of the man of my dreams.

Apparently, I was wrong.

It seems two women have taken it upon themselves to educate the rest of womankind on the art of GETTING A MAN.

The book is called "The Rules," and it's selling like mad.

Yes, all over the country women are curling up to a step-by-step guide to every girl's ultimate goal — GETTING THAT RING ON HER FINGER.

"Whether you're 18 or 80, a beauty queen or a woman with ordinary looks, 'The Rules' will work for you," the book promises.

This is enough to work any man-huntin' woman into a foamin' frenzy.

Order that wedding cake now, ladies. Oh, and it's never too early to start dieting to fit into that frilly wedding frock.

Authors Ellen Fein and Sherrie Schneider focus the book on the premise that men are born to respond to a challenge. What better way of posing such a challenge than playing hard to get?

Ladies, take notes. And men, don't lose me now. Keep reading to learn what you're up against. And remember, this is no joke. These women are convinced they have struck gold with this book.

A SAMPLE OF "THE RULES":

- "Don't call him, and rarely return his phone calls."
- "Don't see him more than once or twice a week."
- "Always end the date first." (Leave him wanting more).
- "Always end phone calls first." (The authors suggest buying a timer. Keep discourse to no more than 10 minutes.)

Wait a minute. A guy who keeps coming back after this type of treatment is no husband material. He's a potential stalker.

I mean, come on, what's the difference between following "The Rules" and trying to get rid of a guy? Signals that traditionally say, "Stop calling, ya dork," are supposed to say, "Keep up the hard work, baby, and maybe you'll get some."

Just another pitiful tactic to frustrate the already confused man of the 1990s.

And what if men started following these criteria? Looking into a crystal ball, I see answering machines with no messages, vacant restaurants and a bunch of bored florists sitting around playing poker.

Just when you men thought you had the whole women's-lib thing down: RULE No. 4 — "Don't go Dutch on a date."

So what if the poor schmuck only has enough to take you to McDonald's (drive thru). Let him be a man and pay for that double Big Mac with extra cheese. Remember, he cherishes the thought of being able to take you out, even if this means he'll have to live the rest of the week on beef jerky.

Rule No. 12 — "Stop dating him if he doesn't buy you a romantic gift for your birthday or Valentine's Day."

What? No, I don't think so. I'm still trying to hook up my apartment. Forget sapphire necklaces and gold bracelets. Skip the pearl earrings and please, hold that diamond toe ring.

No, baby, give me something I can put to use. Bring on the microwave, hand over the trash compactor. And if you really want to win my heart, break out the Dirt Devil.

Seriously though, jewelry is nice, but an appliance or another so-called unromantic gift is no kiss of death, either. One of the most romantic gifts I ever got from a man was a book on the history of the HIV virus. Yes, you heard right. I'm very interested in studying communicable diseases (I want to be a health reporter). And being the stud he is, he picked up on this, bought the book and needless to say I was in luuuuuuv.

But let's not bash "The Rules" completely. It has a morsel of good advice straight from granny's kitchen:

- "Don't open up too fast."
- "No more than casual kissing on the first date."
- "Don't date a married man."
- "Don't expect a man to change or try to change him."
- Oh, and remember to strap on that warm underwear in the winter time. (Wait, wrong list). Sorry.

This is the moral of the story:

Restrain yourselves, ladies. Fight the urge to write love letters to the object of your desire. Hold back all that pent up passion. In the long run it will pay off. The man will fall madly in love with you, ask you to marry him and by the time he knows what hit him, the two of you will be skipping down the aisle. So what if you're marrying a complete stranger? Happy honeymoon. Bon voyage. Cheers.

No, but seriously how can you marry someone you barely know? Throughout the whole fiasco you hardly talk to the guy. And how can you have a decent conversation when you're constantly checking that timer?

The sad part is that this book is highly sought after.

That's right, as you are reading this very line, there's a woman out there walking up to a counter at a bookstore.

"Yes, I'd like this," she says handing the clerk a copy of "The Rules."

A sly smile spreads on her face. (She thinks she is holding the secret to a man's heart in the palm of her hand). Oh, the power, the glory. She can almost picture the blinding glare of the diamond, feel the satiny wedding dress and smell the bouquet. All that's missing now is the man. Oh, but surely the book will take care of that.

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

"YESSSSS, YESSSS!" she yells out.

"Huh?" says the lady behind the counter, a bit startled.

Meanwhile back at the farm, I come to the most shocking bit of advice from the madams of matrimony:

"Don't be a loud, knee-slapping, hysterically funny girl." Instead "be quiet and mysterious, act ladylike, cross your legs and smile." Gosh, that knocks me out of the running. I guess I'll never be a RULES GIRL. I'm doomed to lonely nights of curling up with my cat and watching reruns of "Love Connection."

Or maybe I'll just revert to my own rules.

RULE No. 22: Stay away from men who love crotch-rockets and reek of Brut cologne.

Blue Key recognizes leaders at K-State with reception and a day of recognition

ANGIE SIEFKES AND JEFFREY SWEAT
co-directors of Leadership Appreciation Day

How long has leadership been a part of the K-State campus community?

The answer to this question is simple and perhaps obvious. Leadership has been present on this campus since it was founded in 1863. Not only has leadership been present, but it has grown into a K-State tradition, one to be proud of and celebrated.

In this token, the Blue Key Senior Leadership Honorary will be host to Leadership Appreciation Day today.

The purpose of this day is to celebrate and recognize leadership as well as to promote leadership on the K-State campus and in the Manhattan community.

Leaders are present all around us.

Even if people were born with qualities that would make them great leaders, there are many skills that must be learned and enhanced to become more effective leaders.

It matters not whether this role is that of being an active member in a local organization or serving as the CEO of a large corporation.

All of these roles are important and require people with great leadership skills.

Opportunities to become involved and learn about leadership abound on our campus.

As a result, leadership has become an integral tradition at K-State. Blue Key recognizes the importance of campus organizations and further acknowledges that their advisers make immense contributions to the K-State leadership tradition.

Therefore, in recognition of their contributions, Blue Key will be host to an adviser luncheon so organizations will have a formal opportunity to extend their gratitude to their advisers.

> "Even if people were born with qualities that would make them great leaders, there are many skills that must be learned and enhanced to become more effective leaders."

Another way Blue Key is recognizing and celebrating leadership on this campus is through a leadership reception tonight in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. All presidents of University Activities Board-registered organizations have been invited to attend this reception.

The reception is our way of saying thanks for everything these individuals contribute to the leadership tradition on this campus. The leaders of these organizations set an example for all students to follow. Not only are these students preparing for their future leadership roles in society, but they are also encouraging leadership through the examples they set.

Because not every campus leader is always in the limelight, Blue Key has asked organizations to submit the names of members who have made significant leadership contributions to their group.

In no way could we list every leader on this campus, but through an advertisement in today's Collegian, we hope to recognize at least a few of them.

All of these individuals were nominated by their respective organizations.

Through the activities of Leadership Appreciation Day, Blue Key hopes to further promote leadership on our campus. However, we cannot be alone in this task.

We are asking that everyone realize the importance of leadership and promote it in their organizations, among their friends and most importantly, in themselves.

We all have the capability to lead; however, we must first realize this potential and develop it.

KSU Stadium needs expansion to keep up with Big 12 stadiums

Editor,

K-State's football stadium has inadequate seating. There are not enough seats for the people who want seats.

Compared to other Big 12 schools, we have insufficient seating. The University of Nebraska has a stadium that can hold about 75,000 fans. The University of Kansas has a capacity of 48,500 fans. Texas A&M has a stadium capacity of 72,000. Our own KSU Stadium has a seating capacity of 43,000. It goes up to 44,000 spectators when we use the fold-out chairs and set them up in the north end zone. How classy.

Nebraska has a top 10 football team. The Cornhuskers have a tradition behind their 75,000 spectators. K-State is now starting its own tradition, and we need something to support our tradition. A loyal crowd that can sit in its own stadium and watch the team it loves is what we need. We need a facility that can grow with our growing tradition.

The recent increase in attendance over the past eight years, since 1989, is an interest for many people at K-State. The increase in attendance of fans at games is quite noticeable. In the year 1989, season ticket holders tallied up to 9,336. This year season tickets have sky rocketed to 34,000 plus. That is an increase of 360 percent. In the past eight years, there has never been a decrease in ticket sales, there has always been an increase.

An increase in attendance means more than just more money, it means being recognized. A nationally ranked team means that we receive national coverage. This helps not only in the image of the University, but also recruitment gets a boost from the national coverage. Sell-out crowds are a nice thing to hear on the radio or television.

What it comes to is that KSU Stadium needs to be upgraded to accommodate to the fans who want to attend. The old bleachers on the east side of the stadium would be torn down and a new addition would be built to accommodate the fans.

Don't get me wrong, I know the bleachers would cost a tremendous amount of money. But if we would raise the cost of tickets $2 or $3 and our privilege fee the same amount, the University would generate money quickly over the years.

My point is that we need to do things now, because if we wait three or so years and see if we still have sell-out games, it will be a year or two after that before the new seating is available. A quote from the Kansas State Gameday programs said "the KSU stadium and football complex is one of the premiere football facilities in the Midwest." But I say, until we reach a level of other ranked universities or for that fact, some of the non-ranked universities, we will never see the benefits of what an actual premier football stadium is really like.

Other groups deserve the same scrutiny as the football players

Editor,

While I agree with the editorial board opinion in the Nov. 7 issue of the Collegian concerning the actions taken by football coach Bill Snyder, I find it disturbing the board only seemed to focus on trouble within our football team. I wonder why I have never seen an article about the numerous other K-State students who are involved in extra-curricular activities and have been in trouble with the law.

Every time a student misbehaves, the editorial board should find out what groups or activities that student is involved in and put pressure on that group and its leader to kick that student out. Hey, isn't it just as much a privilege to be in the Rodeo Club, on the speech team or write for the Collegian as it is to play football?

Now you might say that the football players seem to get in trouble more than the average student, so I have a challenge for the board. Pick any group on campus with about the same number of students involved as the football team and track its mishaps. I'm sure you'll find our players are in less trouble than the board would lead us to believe.

I would also like to invite the members of the editorial board to our next Aggieville Business Association meeting. I will make sure that your question to the bar members is presented so you can understand that underage drinking is an issue that our association, in connection with the Riley County Police Department, has worked hard on. I look forward to your participation and ideas.

Russian observer thanks K-State for hospitality during his visit

Editor,

As president of the International Discussion Club-Moscow I was invited to visit Manhattan from Nov. 1 through Nov. 11 to observe the U.S. elections and to find possible lessons for Russia.

The visit was organized and paid for by John Daly, associate professor of history, and Thomas Parish, professor of foundations and adult education.

The trip was useful and exciting for me.

I will share the received experience and information with my friends and Russian election officials.

I would like to thank you for the coverage of my visit.

A very good article about it appeared in the Collegian on Nov. 7.

The article was followed by a photo of Bob Dole and myself, and it was the largest photo of myself that has ever been printed in a newspaper.

Let me again thank the organizers of my visit, Daly and Parish, and all the people I met in Manhattan and in the wonderful state of Kansas.

I hope that the links and contacts established between my organization, K-State and other organizations and individuals in Kansas will be useful for both sides and will contribute in the democracy consolidation in Russia.

Sexual harassment on e-mail and IRC needs to be dealt with

Editor,

If the Collegian wants to address the issue of sexual harassment, a good place to start would be right here on our own campus.

In the last several weeks reports of pornographic and suggestive e-mail, sexual harassment on IRC, and the use of public Computing and Network Services labs to view pornography on the Internet has risen sharply.

A few students, including myself, are actively pursuing the implementation of a policy that will protect us from people who have nothing better to do with their time and energy than make lewd and suggestive comments to people on IRC and send us unwanted and unsolicited pornographic e-mail.

Apparently, some of the entities on this campus cannot decide who should bear the burden of these reports and to what extent these individuals should be punished.

I will say that the Affirmative Action Office has done a wonderful job thus far of helping me with my problem.

But are other students with this problem having any success getting their complaints resolved?

If you want to address sexual harassment in this paper, then maybe right here on this campus is the place to start.

Cats receive letter of intent

Scouting report

SHANA NEWELL
sports editor

Adam Lopez, a 5'11", 155-pound guard, signed a national letter of intent Wednesday to play basketball at K-State.

Lopez, a guard, will take the scholarship made available by the graduation of senior Gerald Eaker at the end of the season.

Lopez hails from St. Mary's High School in Glendale, Ariz., where his father coaches. There, he has averaged 24 points, 5.5 rebounds, six assists and three steals over his last two seasons at St. Mary's.

He will be the second member of the Lopez family to play for K-State coach Tom Asbury, who coached brother Damin Lopez during his stint at Pepperdine.

"Adam comes here from a basketball family," Asbury said Wednesday in a press release. "His brother, Damin, was a great player for me at Pepperdine and would have been a great player in the Big 12."

Asbury said he expects the same, if not more, from the younger Lopez.

"Adam is bigger, stronger, and has many of the same skills as Damin," he said. "We certainly expect good things from Adam and a promising Big 12 career."

Adam Lopez was a second-team all-state selection last year and is in the running to be the player-of-the year in Arizona this season.

Women's sports gain air-time recognition from television

MY

Dan LEWERENZ

The time has come.

Women's basketball season begins this weekend, and the kick-off will be grand.

Not only will our beloved Wildcats take to the hardwood for an exhibition game Sunday against Uralmash, a club team from Russia, but the regular season will also begin for a number of teams around the country.

Kansas will be among the first in action, playing host to Southern Methodist in the opening round of the preseason Women's NIT. A win will earn the Jayhawks the dubious honor of traveling to Knoxville, Tenn., to face defending national champion Tennessee, the team that bounced the Hawks from the NCAA Tournament last March.

Personally, if given the choice of playing Tennessee in Knoxville or taking home a year's supply of Rice-a-Roni (the San Francisco Treat), I'd probably open the box and invite some friends for dinner. It's bound to go down easier.

The Cats take the court a bit later with a 2 p.m. tip-off Sunday in Bramlage.

Those of you not watching the game (I assume this means you can't find your student ID, since students are admitted free to games) will probably be shunning the usual NFL action for ESPN's broadcast of the State Farm Tip-Off Classic, featuring No. 1 Stanford playing host to No. 2 Alabama.

I guarantee my VCR will be set.

For me, the whole idea of catching women's hoops on TV is mind-boggling. Just a couple years ago, the only women's games on the tube were the Final Four match-ups, and they were wedged back-to-back, so they didn't compete with men's games.

Now women's basketball and volleyball are both staples of the sports-oriented couch potato's diet.

Watching the K-State volleyball team rally to beat then-No. 19 Texas Tech a couple weeks ago was exciting. Watching the team beat Kansas the following Wednesday was also pretty cool.

It wasn't too long ago the Wildcats couldn't count on Lawrence High School to roll over and give in. Lawrence is, after all, one of the top high school programs in the state — capable of giving K-State a good run a couple years ago.

Watching the Baylor game on television last Sunday morning was exceptional.

Actually, I can only imagine. I ended up working Sunday, so I didn't get to watch the match, the first K-State home volleyball match ever broadcast.

There is a growing market for women's athletics. College games are drawing record crowds — including here in Manhattan, where the Cats have established themselves as one of the 20 best crowd draws in college volleyball nationally, which greatly increases the chance of K-State's playing host to NCAA Tournament play in December.

Point, Cats!

And K-State and the Big 12 will be on the leading edge of that movement.

Two K-State women's basketball games will be televised as part of the Big 12 package with FoxSports, and one volleyball match (the homestand against Baylor) has already aired.

Other showcase games include Texas Tech welcoming Southeastern Conference rival and defending national champion Tennessee, Colorado playing host to Final Four participant Stanford and Texas Tech visiting Kansas in Lawrence.

The world is starting to discover women's sports. American Basketball League founder Jennifer Azzi is doing Reebok commercials, and Team USA soccer star Mia Hamm is a representative for Pert Plus.

As their names and the names of their colleagues in the professional and collegiate ranks more well-known, more and more games will be offered as part of regular television packages.

These are the games that, while they're still years away from pulling an audience from ESPN's Big Monday, will serve as a national showcase to women's sports.

K-State ranks no longer as worst team in Division I

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

Wildcat football fans might want to sit down before reading this.

The K-State football program is no longer the losingest Division I football program in the country.

As of Saturday, when the Wildcats beat the Jayhawks and the Wake Forest Demon Deacons lost to Florida State, K-State moved ahead of Wake Forest by less than one-tenth of a percentage point.

K-State currently has an overall record of 353-545-41, which gives it a winning percentage of 39.77 percent. Wake Forest, similarly, has a record of 332-513-33, giving it a winning percentage of 39.69 percent.

If you're doing the math and it doesn't seem to be working out, here's why.

To calculate winning percentage, according to information from the NCAA, the total number of wins plus half the ties is divided by the total number of games played.

Hang on. Don't get your hopes up.

After the Colorado game Saturday, there is a chance K-State could move back into last place.

If the Cats lose to the Buffaloes and the Demon Deacons beat the Duke Blue Devils, Wake Forest will move ahead by less than three-hundreths of a percentage point.

Wehrman

Now that the football program is the second-losingest Division I school in the country, it still has a long way to go.

For the Wildcats to scratch their way to an even 50 percent, they have a long haul ahead. In fact, they have to go undefeated for more than 14 consecutive seasons.

Casey Wehrman, linebacker for the Wildcats, said he thought it was great that K-State has come so far in such a short time.

Wehrman especially stressed the effect Coach Snyder has had on the program and its tradition.

"When I first came here, we were trying to get ranked, but we just didn't have the tradition," Wehrman said. "Now, we're building a great program. I just find it amazing Snyder has brought the team this far, this fast."

No. 1 Cincinnati to battle Big 12 powerhouse Kansas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Cincinnati, with relentless clawing by its defense and incessant jawing by Coach Bob Huggins, has reached the NCAA Tournament's Elite Eight three times in the last five years.

Could this be the season the Bearcats move up and claim a national title?

Led by 6'7", 260-pound Danny Fortson and bruising defense, the Bearcats are the preseason pick as No. 1, not only in Conference USA but across the country.

"We've been pretty good for a long time, and we want to be pretty good for a long time to come," Huggins said, adding he's not worried about the expectations or the lofty ranking.

Kansas, the preseason pick at No. 2, must find a way to compensate early until senior guard Jacque Vaughn, who decided against going pro, recovers from a broken wrist. He's expected back in January when the inaugural Big 12 season takes off.

"You don't replace Jacque Vaughn. You try to hide the weaknesses and promote the other areas where you are strong," Coach Roy Williams said. "It doesn't say Jacque Vaughn on the jersey. It says Kansas on the jersey. This is a team."

Vaughn also made the preseason all-America.

Senior center Scot Pollard and Raef LaFrentz give the Jayhawks a powerful inside game.

Iowa State, meanwhile, rewarded Coach Tim Floyd with a contract extension after he led the Cyclones to a 24-win season, a victory over Kansas in the then Big 8 tournament and an NCAA tournament bid.

The Jayhawks and Cyclones face a bigger and better conference after four teams from the defunct Southwest Conference were added.

In the Big 10, Minnesota has all five starters back, and Coach Clem Haskins acknowledged it is potentially one of his best teams in his decade as coach.

"We have a chance to compete for the title," he said.

Guard Bobby Jackson and 6'9", 265-pound John Thomas give the Gophers an inside and outside game.

New coach plans different defensive style for '96-'97 Cats

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

When Coach Deb Patterson inherited the K-State women's basketball program, she knew she had some rebuilding to do.

The Wildcats have had just one winning season since 1991, finishing 14-16 last season. Four starters and three reserves returned to the team, but all would have to learn a new system.

In short, the prognosis could have been grim.

But the players Patterson inherited have a strong feel for the game, and after several weeks of practice, the picture is starting to look brighter.

"I feel like they're just starting to get an inkling of what we're trying to do," Patterson said Tuesday.

With former coach Brian Agler, the Cats developed a reputation for in-your-face defense, leading the Big 8 in a number of defensive categories in Agler's three seasons.

The instincts ingrained in K-State's returners have made progress on the defensive end even quicker than expected.

"This has been a traditionally strong defensive team, and some of the concepts are going to overlap," Patterson said. "The defense is definitely coming along quicker."

That's not to say there won't be changes on the defensive end. Agler played almost exclusively man-to-man defense, mixing in an occasional trapping one-three-one zone. Patterson said she plans more extensive use of zones mixed with man coverage.

The offense, too, is starting to gel, Patterson said. And although progress might not be as quick as it has been on defense, it might be more impressive.

"Our major challenge will be on the offensive end of the floor," she said.

"And frankly, I'm amazed at how quick they're picking it up on the offensive end of the floor."

Jacobson

Considering that Patterson plans to utilize a complex, triple-post offense, the transition has been more amazing.

Individually, a number of players have been moved from their former spots — junior Brit Jacobson will play point guard after two seasons as a small forward, senior Kjersten Larson returns to the point after playing in the post, and sophomore Sara Munson will play a wing after getting most of her time inside as a freshman.

Freshman Sunny Jacobson, who did not practice until two weeks ago because of problems with the NCAA Clearinghouse, has also started to find her place on the team.

"I'm really impressed with their ability to pick things up and make adjustments from their traditional roles at K-State," Patterson said.

"Sunny's made a good transition. She's worked well to pick up a lot of the concepts she may be needing later on. She's not a player we're counting on right now for major minutes, so it gives her a chance to get conformable in our system."

The Cats will take the floor for the first time this season at 2 p.m. Sunday when they face Uralmash, a club team from Russia.

Constellations, mythology light up planetarium shows

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

A small group of people at K-State would like to open the universe for anyone who's interested. The group will present monthly programs at the planetarium on the fourth floor of Cardwell Hall.

The first show, "The Night Skies Over Manhattan," was Sept. 26. The next show, scheduled for 7 p.m. Saturday, covers the myths of Perseus and Andromeda.

> "When you look at the moon, the light is almost blinding."
> • LLOYD VERHAGE
> NETWORK ADMINISTRATOR

"We will take a look into Perseus mythology and the constellations visible in November. Then we'll take people up to look for Saturn and the moon. Bring your binoculars," said Lloyd Verhage, network administrator at Justin Hall.

Cassiopeia and Cepheus are two constellations visible to the naked eye. They are part of a group of constellations that includes Pegasus, Andromeda and Perseus. Pamela Thornton, junior in biological engineering, will present the information about the constellations at Saturday night's program.

"My friend talked me into going to a Physics Club meeting, and I learned about the planetarium project. I'm interested in astronomy, and it seemed like a good idea, so I decided to help," Thornton said.

Verhage said the planetarium had shows from 1963 to 1993. A few years ago it was busy, but since 1993 there has been no astronomy club and not enough interest to keep it open.

Some Physics Club members, including Verhage, started cleaning up the planetarium last semester and moving stuff around, planning to reopen it for shows. They were shocked it was not being used, he said.

"Dr. Zollman has given us the most support, but it would be nice if the word got out that the planetarium is reopened," Verhage said. "They have the facility and let us volunteer."

Dean Zollman, professor of physics, said as long as the planetarium is there and the Physics Club wants to do the shows, members are welcome to use it.

"They've done all the work themselves," Zollman said. "I'm really just a cheerleader."

The planetarium features a 17-inch telescope with a mirror about 1-1/2 feet across, Verhage said.

"When you look at the moon, the light is almost blinding," he said.

About 35 people showed up for the first show. All shows are free and open to the public. He said he wanted people to just show up. If there are too many people, they will probably do two shows.

"It would be nice to have a lot of support," Verhage said. "We'd like to let the physics department know it was very popular."

In late March there will be a lunar eclipse, and the Hale-Bopp Comet will appear, prompting more show plans.

"The comet is supposed to be incredibly bright. It's predicted to be one of the brightest, but that can vary depending on how close to us and how close to the sun it is," Verhage said. "How intrinsically bright a comet is depends on how much gas and dust it gives off."

Astronomy, Verhage's hobby for 25 years, is the thing Verhage said he's probably done the most in his life. Right now, the group wants to plan one show a month, with several showings. Eventually members want to open the planetarium to schools.

"A lot of planetariums, you can buy the program tapes and listen to them as you look. We are sitting down and looking at this information and putting it together to present to people in person," he said.

Fashion aside, doctors say cartilage piercing might turn out to be cosmetically hazardous

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

Piercing the cartilage in your upper ear could be dangerous to your health, area doctors said.

It could result in serious infection and even surgery, said John Barlow, an ear, nose and throat specialist in Manhattan.

Barlow said he and doctors at Lafene Health Center have seen numerous patients with inflamed ears due to piercing of the cartilage on the upper ear. In some cases, Barlow said, patients can be treated with intravenous antibiotics twice a day for seven to 10 days followed by oral antibiotics. Other cases, he added, require surgery to remove the infected cartilage.

"In all these patients, none had any understanding or any concepts that this could happen," he said. "If you have a post through cartilage, you are at risk."

He also said cartilage is especially vulnerable, because it has poor blood flow. If it gets infected, cartilage is likely to stay infected. Poor blood flow also inhibits regular oral or topical antibiotics from working. Patients with infected ear cartilage can fix it with intravenous antibiotics or, if the case is severe, with surgery.

Barlow said a patient with severely infected ear cartilage could spend up to $60,000 from the beginning surgery and antibiotics to reconstructive surgery afterward.

Barlow recommends taking any earring in cartilage out, and if the ear looks red or swollen, he said to seek medical attention immediately.

But places that pierce cartilage on a regular basis, like Claire's Accessories and Rad-A-Tat Tattoo, have somewhat different ideas about the procedure.

"There is nothing specifically about cartilage piercing that is different from a regular piercing," Suad Suleiman, assistant manager at Claire's Accessories, said.

Suleiman also said Claire's corporate headquarters had done its own research into cartilage piercing and has deemed it an OK procedure for the stores' trained employees to perform.

"A long time ago, we weren't allowed to do it, but now we can," she said.

Suleiman also said the possibility of infection is due to bad hygiene and sensitivity to different types of metal.

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

Garrett Spencer, owner of Rad-A-Tat Tattoo, said he doesn't recommend cartilage piercing because he thinks there is a risk of facial paralysis as the result of the piercing.

Even though Spencer said he has seen cases of facial paralysis due to such a piercing, Barlow said facial paralysis is not the result of a piercing in ear cartilage.

"Nope, it's not true," Barlow said. "I'm glad they're not recommending it, though."

Spencer said even though he sees risk involved in cartilage piercing, if someone insists on it, he will do the procedure.

"We'll do it. We just tell them the risks involved," he said.

Beth Lee, a piercer at Rad-A-Tat, said if a customer gets an infection, it's due to hygiene.

"If you get a piercing done in a professional shop, the infection is from the customer," she said.

Lee also said earrings from Rad-A-Tat used in the piercing are made of surgical stainless steel, reducing the risk of metal sensitivity.

Robert Ecklund, a staff physician at Lafene, said no matter what kind of needle is used, any kind of cartilage piercing is bad for the body.

"Whenever you breach the skin, you are risking infection," he said. "Medically speaking, I would recommend against it, at the very least."

'Hair' to appear on McCain's stage

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

One of the most controversial musicals from the sexual revolution will be performed on campus this week by KSU Theatre.

"Hair," a famous musical production from 1968 by Gerome Ragni and James Rado, will be performed at 8 p.m. from Thursday to Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Marci Maullar, managing director of KSU Theatre, said "Hair" is relevant today, because it tells how far society has come in the past 25 years.

"It tells how far we've come in accepting the establishment, and maybe it's a call to remind people they can make a difference," Maullar said.

The musical follows a long-haired young man through the final days before he reports to the U.S. Army.

One of the most controversial subjects in the musical is the way it deals with nudity.

Maullar said the nude scene is important, because it expresses how nudity can set people free to express what they believe and lets people cast away the stereotypes against them.

"Basically, it's just about freedom and being yourself and not having to talk about social injustice and not treating people different just because they have long hair," Maullar said.

The K-State version of the musical will stay true in most cases to the original script. The exception will be the way the nude scenes are presented.

There will only be one nude actor. He will appear briefly in black light with back lighting. He will be wrapped in translucent material and carried off stage.

Tickets are $8 for students and seniors, and $11 for the general public. They can be purchased at the McCain Box Office between noon and 5 p.m. weekdays. Reservations can be made with a credit card by calling 532-6428.

Ella Fitzgerald to be honored by governor at K-State Jazz Festival

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The "First Lady of Song" will be honored by the first man of Kansas today.

Gov. Bill Graves will honor the late songbird Ella Fitzgerald with the proclamation of Feb. 1, 1997, as Ella Fitzgerald Day in Kansas. The date coincides with the 1997 K-State Jazz Festival.

"It's part of the festival, and it's a way to honor people," said Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies and director of the festival.

"It's also Black History Month in February, and it gives the University a way to honor that part of America," Wilson said. "We need to remember those people of the past."

The festival will honor Fitzgerald, who died last year, for her contributions to jazz music. In a career that spans the history of modern jazz, Fitzgerald rose to prominence through her interpretation of jazz classics by George Gershwin and Cole Porter, and by developing a signature style of scat singing.

"Ella has done so much for vocal jazz music," Wilson said.

Wilson said by celebrating a vocal jazz singer, the focus of the 1997 festival will be on vocal jazz — an aspect lacking at K-State.

"We need a jazz vocal ensemble here at K-State," Wilson said. "It's going to start next semester."

Wilson said the addition of a vocal jazz program to K-State is important for creating a well-rounded music program.

"We do not have a jazz program at K-State," he said. "One person — me — is not a program."

Another feature of the 1997 festival will be the continuation of the historical lecture series, which will focus on Fitzgerald's career.

"I knew Ella, not very well," Wilson said, "but some of the guys in the Basie band knew Ella well."

Wilson said Fitzgerald was to be honored in 1997 even if she were still living. Plans to honor Dizzy Gillespie during the 1998 festival are in the works, he said.

In 1996, the festival featured the Count Basie Orchestra, which will be returning in '97 along with the vocal jazz group New York Voices.

The festival is also a chance for Kansas high-school jazz bands and vocal jazz groups to perform in concert and in workshops with the Basie band and New York Voices, respectively.

Graves honored the Basie band by proclaiming Feb. 1, 1996, as Count Basie Day in Kansas.

Mike Matson, Graves' press secretary, said the K-State Jazz Festival means a lot to those involved and those who enjoy jazz music, and Graves' proclamation is a way to acknowledge state government feels the same way.

Matson said Graves likes jazz music.

"He was flattered at the composition written especially for him last year," Matson said.

Wilson composed the piece "Graves Groove" in honor of the governor. The piece was played by the Count Basie Orchestra along with a selected outstanding high-school musician from the festival. This tradition will continue in '97. Graves did not attend the '96 concert and has no plans, as of yet, to attend in '97.

Tickets can already be purchased for the Basie concert, which will be at 8 p.m. on Feb. 1 in McCain Auditorium, by calling the McCain Box Office at 532-6428. For more information regarding the festival, call the Department of Music at 532-5740.

Premiere performance conducted by ensemble

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

Freezing temperatures did not keep some music lovers from enjoying the K-State Brass Ensemble performance Tuesday night in All Faiths Chapel.

The 20-member ensemble shared its music with the community when it presented a performance in conjunction with the 1996-97 K-State Music Department Concert Series.

One of the highlights of the concert included the ensemble's premiere performance of "Fanfare for Brass," by James Niblock. This opening selection had an upbeat tempo but tended to be a bit heavy as well. In fact, it was similar to many of the music themes created for the movies. Its short nature would have made it ideal for the crescendo of the story.

Other well-organized pieces were the "Canzon Primi Toni," a majestic arrangement by Giovanni Gabrieli, and "British Eighth," a British military march.

"Canzon Primi Toni" was impressive and dramatic. Originally made to combine human voices and other instruments, this piece was altered to accept the combination of brass instruments and the organ.

"British Eighth" was an exciting selection due to its rapid tempo and cheerful presentation. It had many similarities to carnival music.

The ensemble also performed "A Nightingale Sang in Berkeley Square," which is a lyrical melody that passes through the brass sections. At times, the piece seemed unsynchronized, as well as less smooth than it was intended to be.

Based on the hymn tune "Lobe den Herrn," the ensemble presented its style variety by introducing three different sections. "Intrada" was a fanfare, "Intermezzo" was more melodic and "Canzona" was meant to be technical.

It was an interesting combination of classic musical arrangements, with selections such as the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" and "How Great Thou Art." These two sections were well-done and presented a good blend of instruments.

The final part of this arrangement seemed to present some problems for the ensemble, because the tempo did not always seem to match in the different brass sections. It was an unusual selection, however, and the ensemble successfully presented the different types of music.

Many of the selected songs were done well, but some also tended to sound disorganized and heavy. Regardless, the warm atmosphere and presentation of the brass arrangements proved to make it an enjoyable evening for the audience.

Actor back to comedy after proving her worth

ASSOCIATED PRESS

As director-star, Barbra Streisand has made three movies in 13 years.

Charlie Chaplin in his prime maintained much the same pace. He was a perfectionist who made and remade his films until they achieved his vision. The same with Streisand. Though she has never achieved the sublime quality of Chaplin, her films have been highly original and extremely watchable.

After a period musical ("Yentl") and heavy drama ("The Prince of Tides"), Streisand turns to romantic comedy with "The Mirror Has Two Faces."

The result is an entertaining, sometimes hilarious study of the absurdities of romance, done with more depth than most films of the genre.

In the first part of the movie, Streisand plays the ugly duckling. She is a bright, sensitive, highly popular professor of romantic literature at Columbia University. Never married, she lives with her acerbic mother (Lauren Bacall) and resists dates.

All her life, she has considered herself unattractive. She has a beautiful sister (Mimi Rogers) who is about to marry her handsome third husband (Pierce Brosnan).

Enter Jeff Bridges, a klutzy, boring math professor, also at Columbia. He is maladroit with women and thinks sex is overrated.

Desperately seeking companionship, he takes the advice of his faculty buddy (George Segal) and places an advertisement specifying he would like to meet a Ph.D., older than 35, physical appearance not important.

Rogers sends her sister's specifications and photo to Bridges. He seeks out Streisand, and they meet and click — intellectually. He proposes marriage, with the proviso that they enjoy companionship but eschew sex.

Her intellect allows her to accept such a basis for marriage. But eventually, her libido objects. That's the boy-loses-girl element of the plot.

It's hard to imagine anyone but Streisand with the chutzpah to pull off such an outrageous situation. But she does, beautifully.

Streisand as actress remains fascinating to watch, especially when she makes her now-familiar transition from frump to beauty. As director, she stays in total control, granting her actors the same opportunity to shine.

Bridges conveys the intellectual confusion of the earnest professor. At first, Bacall seems saddled with the cliché of the nagging Jewish mother. Later on, she has a scene of rare poignancy, showing what a fine actress she is.

The credits leave no doubt whose film it is. The titles list Streisand's name four times, including composer of the love theme. As a reminder, "A Film by Barbra Streisand" appears at the end of the movie.

"The Mirror Has Two Faces" is a TriStar Pictures release produced by Streisand and Arnon Milchan, and written by Richard LaGravanese. Rated PG-13 for adult situations and occasional profanity. Running time is 126 minutes.

Find games on the Internet

website review

When most people get bigger and faster computers, it's not for word processing, making spreadsheets go faster, or even to get that database to sing. No, they upgrade to make their games run better. This week we look at the best sites on the Internet dedicated to video games.

Games Domain
(http://www.gamesdomain.com/)

Probably the best site out on the Net dedicated to games is the Games Domain.

This page is dedicated to video games of all platforms. The page includes Nintendo and Sega games, and I've even found a few Atari games listed. But its main bulk is computer games and shareware.

Its download section has hundreds of games. Each game is specifically designed to kill any student's grade point average, so have fun kids.

A quick way to find something to help kill that GPA is to go to this page's top 5. It will have the most popular games on the Net. The freebies section is hardly worth mentioning, and if the Net is slow, I wouldn't bother even visiting. I do recommend the reviews section that lets surfers figure out if they want to buy a game before shelling out hard-earned cash.

Nintendo Net
(http://member.aol.com/WJrandon/welcome.htm)

Nintendo fans of all ages should love this page.

Though the writer of this page loves to quote Nintendo Power magazine and other Nintendo sources, it isn't a Nintendo site. Our author only does it to glorify the games.

In fact, the reviews are just copied straight from Nintendo Power, so don't expect to hear anything but praise.

The tips/codes section is good if you happen to have one of the games listed.

Unfortunately it isn't the most complete collection in the world. What I like best about Nintendo Net is its preview of the Nintendo 64. It has many screen shots of games that are still to be released. So if you are on the fence about buying the new game system, here is a place to look.

Overall, this is a nice site if you like Nintendo.

Game Fanatic Cheats
(http://www.xmission.com/)

There is really nothing very interesting on this homepage except a program that most gamers should download. The Game Fanatic Cheats is in version 4.0 and it continues to improve with time. It has more cheats for more systems than you can imagine. Try it out, after all it's shareware. It's not like you have to buy it to try it out.

The PlayStation Galleria
(http://www.vidgames.com/)

If you have a Sony PlayStation, this is an important stop before you buy a new game.

This site handles the PlayStation in every way. It looks at the hardware specs, the future Sony game products and all 179 games.

The review section deserves to be mentioned, because it is designed for ease of use, allowing itself to be searched alphabetically, by release date or even type of game. It's a good site for fans.

Every week, Darin Siefkes, senior in history, and radio and television, will review various sites on the World Wide Web.

Do you know an interesting site, have a question or want to comment?

Meditation therapy offered at Lafene to help health woes

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

When students' classes, jobs and relationships have them at the end of their rope, their doctor might prescribe a good dose of meditation therapy. Lafene Health Center offers students a chance to meditate themselves to better health.

Kris Barnard, licensed practical nurse at Lafene, started teaching herself meditation seven years ago as crisis intervention. She said it has helped her reverse physical symptoms and stay healthy and positive.

Barnard has taught stress management through UFM for four years. This is the first semester it is being offered free at Lafene.

Barnard said the effects of stress can create many negative physical health problems.

"Stress can cause high blood pressure, shallow respiration, tight muscles, a hyperactive stomach and intestines, disruptive sleep patterns and a repressed immune system," Barnard said.

Many of the body's ways of dealing with stress are taken out on the body. Managing that stress can be a useful tool in staying healthy, she said.

"About 75 to 80 percent of visits to doctors are caused by stress," Barnard said. "By relaxing and not thinking about anything for even 10 minutes, you can better deal with your problems and be a healthier person."

Students interested must be referred by their doctor. After that, Barnard helps the students through six sessions of meditation.

"I guide them through meditation tapes and exercises to help them learn how to relax their body, focus on their breath and put the garbage of the day behind them," Barnard said.

The tapes help people focus for a set amount of time using different nature sounds to aid in relaxation.

Barnard said everyone likes getting outside and enjoying nature. Meditation is just one way to take yourself there mentally and come away feeling energized.

"It's not the kind of meditation some people think it is," Barnard said. "We don't chant for three hours, get naked and bang our heads on the wall."

Barnard said the important thing to learn is sometimes you can't change the situation or the stress, but you can change the response to it. Meditation can be used as a tool to help deal with the situation better.

Shannon Totman, junior in business administration, was one of Barnard's first patients.

This is Totman's first year at K-State. Having just moved from California, she found it really hard to adjust to everything.

"At first I was a little skeptical, but I was having a lot of back trouble, and nothing was working. So I thought I'd try it," Totman said. "The meditation helped me learn to relax and helped me focus on the things I needed to get done."

ARMY

Army Secretary Togo West to report on how their units communicated resolve not to tolerate sexual harassment or unprofessional relationships at any level of command.

Pentagon spokesman Sam Grizzle called the move precautionary. He said no evidence had surfaced that the other services are experiencing particular problems similar to those of the Army.

"This is a common-sense measure," Grizzle said.

An Army drill sergeant at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., pleaded guilty to having sex with three female recruits in the second such incident reported by the Army within the past week.

At the Army's Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland, the Army charged four drill instructors and a captain with raping, sexually harassing or having improper contact with at least a dozen young women recruits. The men were suspended along with 15 other instructors, pending resolution of investigations.

The Army said the two cases are unrelated.

Army spokesman Lt. Col. Bill Harkey said the Army's Training and Doctrine Command, responsible for 17 training bases and about two dozen Army schools, plans a survey of all such training programs by its inspector general.

"They need to go out and see if there is a systematic problem that needs to be addressed," Harkey said, but the assessments have yet to begin.

HANDICAP

they are handicapped.

- Students who use their reserved-stall permit and give their state-issued tag to a friend.
- Students who drive their handicapped friends to campus and then use the permit for themselves.

"All three of those cases are illegal," Amaro said. "The state can fine you up to $2,500."

Amaro said you can even receive a fine of $100 for pulling into a handicap spot to drop off someone on campus.

"As soon as you pull into the spot, you are breaking the law," he said.

Amaro said handicapped students need to realize they must have their state permit and campus permit visible at all times. The only exception would be in the metered parking stalls, which they can park in for free. Otherwise, a warning or ticket may be given if both tags are not there.

"We do not have many problems with the handicap parking," he said. "It is pretty rare. We issue tickets to about four to five handicap stalls per week."

Hair grow it, show it, go see it

'HAIR,' a play portraying the 1960s, is packed with singing, dancing and a lot of hair. 'Hair' is showing Thursday through Saturday in McCain Auditorium.
CLIF PALMBERG Collegian

Period musical pulls it off

SETH GURSS
staff reporter

Drop acid, not bombs. George Wallace is the antichrist. Lay, don't slay. Masturbation can be fun.

All were either said or written at Thursday's opening-night performance of the controversial musical "Hair" in McCain Auditorium.

The period piece, set in 1968 during the Vietnam War, was performed wonderfully.

▶ REVIEW

I had the privilege of seeing "Hair" about six years ago in Wichita. It was done by a group of trained stage actors who traveled throughout the country performing it.

I would have to say the production last night was of the same quality as the musical in Wichita. The actors, all students at K-State, performed "Hair" as if they were professionals.

A half-hour before the musical even began, the actors were already in character and frolicking around blowing bubbles and burning incense in the auditorium. At the same time, '60s rock 'n' roll music was playing while recognizable snapshots were shown on a screen at the back of the stage.

Once the performance began, it was a non-stop, two-hour-long flashback to the sexual revolution. All of the actors wore costumes and body paint that matched the clothing and body paint of hippies of the late '60s perfectly.

"Hair" is a story about a young man, Claude, who is in his final days before he must report to the Army. He is dealing with the pressures of being drafted and is unsure whether he should

Actor shows up naked at dress rehearsal; audience expected to appreciate meaning

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

One cast member from the musical play "Hair" showed up to dress rehearsal without his costume.

Mark White, junior in vocal performance, performs the nude scene in "Hair."

The musical is showing at McCain Auditorium this weekend, but dress rehearsal has been all week.

"I've been practicing all this week," White said. "After the initial shock of getting naked, it wasn't that bad."

White plays one of the lead roles in the play. As part of that role, he gets to do the famous nude scene.

"It's actually called the water-ritual scene," White said. "There's no point of a guy getting on stage just to be naked. The scene is in the play to make a point."

The scene is done with black lights and candles. White said everyone else on stage sings around him.

"The song is only about two minutes long, and time goes by pretty fast," White said.

White said all the other cast members were as supportive as his family. He said he never once felt uncomfortable or looked-down-upon for doing a nude scene, because it has its point and place in the production.

"At first it was kind of scary, but I don't think it's going to have that big of an impact," White said. "There is so much more in the show that will make an impression on people that it won't be long before they forget about the nude scene."

Marci Maullar, managing director, said "Hair" will attract a good audience each night, but the nude scene won't necessarily attract a bigger crowd.

David Frain, assistant director, said ticket sales were going well.

"Out of 1,650 seats in McCain, there's been 900 reserved seats sold for Thursday, 800 for Friday and 700 for Saturday," Frain said.

White said he knows people will walk out talking about it for a while, but the effect the whole play makes is more important than the one short scene.

"If everyone starts laughing, then I'll know something's wrong," White said.

Dictator's illness cause of unrest; Rwanda, Burundi worsen plight

JEREMY KELLEY
staff writer

Zaire, a central African country, has been in the news lately because of the dictatorship of President Joseph Mobutu. Many Zairian students at K-State have spoken out against this unfair rule.

"He has used the Rwandan refugee situation to prop himself up," Stephan Tubene, president of Zairian Students of America, said.

Mobutu seized power through a coup in 1965 and has ruled the people of Zaire harshly for more than 30 years.

"To protect the future of Zaire, I believe that Mobutu must resign as president," Tubene said.

Mobutu traveled to Switzerland in August to seek medical attention for his medical problem with prostate cancer.

Zairian students at K-State and people of Zaire said they think this departure by the president is an opportunity to get rid of the dictator and his cohorts.

"Many Zairians saw his possible death or departure as the potential break-up of the country," Tubene said. "But Mobutu used this illness to boost his dictatorship."

Kisangani Emizet, assistant political science professor, said if Mobutu died today, there would be a military take-over in Zaire.

"Mobutu's coalition would take over the city," Emizet said. "The people of Zaire will not tolerate soldiers in power again. They have too much to lose."

However, the Rwandan and Burundian governments saw Mobutu's illness as an opportunity to settle on 175 miles of Zairian land and drive hundreds of thousands of Rwandan Hutus from U.N.

U.S. calls for cease-fire in Zaire before mission

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States wants warring factions in Zaire to promise a cease-fire before U.S. and allied troops agree to move in to assure the delivery of relief aid to a million refugees, the Pentagon said Thursday.

There was still fighting during the day within a few miles of where the multinational force plans to start.

"We aren't anticipating a combat operation," spokesman Kenneth Bacon said at the Pentagon. "What we would like is a pledge by the sides that there will be a cease-fire."

The proposal to send 1,000 U.S. troops to secure the Goma airfield and use about 3,000 other Americans to open an air bridge of relief supplies was being discussed Thursday at the United Nations.

Authentic Zairian food and dance will be featured at Zairian Nite Saturday. The event will be from 6 to 9 p.m. in the International Student Center.

The International Coordinating Council and Zairian Students of America are sponsoring the event with the theme "Democracy in Zaire."

The dinner will begin about 6 p.m. and include different selections of vegetables and meats.

"There will be green peas and rice," Stephan Tubene, secretary of the ICC, said. "Lamb, sausage and fried chicken dishes will be served."

Tubene said a cultural show will start at 7 p.m., beginning with a video presentation. The video, produced by NBC, is about Zairian democracy.

A dance will follow the presentation.

"There will be a Zairian dance performed by different groups and some volunteer students," Tubene said.

Tickets for the event can be purchased at the International Student Center or at the K-State Student Union today from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Tickets are $5 in advance and $6 at the door. Children's tickets are $3.

Senate speechless as allocation of funds passes with authority

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

Student Senate surprised itself with its own efficiency Thursday night.

The debate on the $206,190 allocation for the Educational Opportunity Fund was expected to last well into the night, but there was no discussion at all.

After EOF chair Aaron Otto explained the changes made in the bill at the committee meeting Sunday night, Senate Chair Aubrey Abbott opened the floor for debate.

After a moment of silence, Abbott said, "You've got to be kidding. Last chance. Is there any debate?"

Senators looked around with wide eyes and gasps of "No way!" and "Let's vote!"

Abbott asked for debate one last time, and then Senate voted 54-1 to pass the allocation.

EOF is designed to help under-represented groups of students.

"Kind of the underlying theme to all this is helping people who have had trouble entering the system," Otto said.

Otto asked senators at last week's meeting to attend the Sunday-night EOF committee meeting to cut down on amendments and questions.

It worked.

Groups such as the Community Service Program and several groups of graduate teaching assistants received funding based on the committee's criteria.

24 HOURS IN REVIEW

NATION WORLD

• RIOTS ERUPT IN FLORIDA. Small fires burned early Thursday after a night of looting, rock-throwing and shooting by rioters angry that a white officer was cleared in the fatal shooting of an 18-year-old black man.

Mobs roamed the streets of predominantly black south St. Petersburg Wednesday evening, the same area where violence erupted after the Oct. 24 shooting. They set 84 fires, attacked passers-by with bottles and chunks of concrete, and shot at a police helicopter, wounding the co-pilot. Another officer was shot in the calf, and at least seven other people were injured.

More than 200 police officers took to the streets. They closed off streets and fired canisters of tear gas, and the National Guard was placed on standby. But by early today, the only trouble was about eight remaining blazes in homes and businesses. Several people were arrested. Other details on the arrests were not immediately available.

• UNABOMBER PROSECUTORS TO PROVIDE DOCUMENTS. Prosecutors in the trial of Unabomber suspect Theodore Kaczynski will give defense lawyers most of the documents they want — except the handwritten notes of federal agents who searched Kaczynski's Montana cabin. The U.S. attorney's office disclosed the agreement in a brief filed Wednesday in U.S. District Court.

• EX-STUDENT INDICTED IN CYBERSPACE HATE CRIME. A former college student was indicted on 10 federal hate-crime charges for allegedly sending computer messages threatening to kill Asian students. Wednesday's grand-jury indictment of Richard Machado, 19, of Irvine marks the first time the government has prosecuted an alleged federal hate crime committed in cyberspace.

Machado could spend up to a decade in jail and face up to a $1 million fine if convicted. The grand jury accused Machado of sending a threatening electronic message to about 60 University of California, Irvine, students Sept. 20.

• HEBRON AGREEMENT ELUSIVE, ARAFAT NOT OPTOMISTIC. Schoolchildren draped in the red, black, green and white of the Palestinian flag marched through the streets of Hebron Thursday, celebrating what many hope will be the city's last Palestinian Independence Day under Israeli occupation.

As Palestinian security agents and Israeli troops armed with assault rifles watched the procession, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators in Jerusalem tried yet again to reach agreement on the long-delayed Israeli troop withdrawal from Hebron.

As they have before in the weeks of talks, Israeli officials said they hoped to make a deal within days. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, however, said he was not optimistic.

CITY STATE

• REGENTS DISCUSS INCREASED HOUSING FEES. Members of the state Board of Regents took their first look Thursday at a series of proposed increases in housing and academic fees at state universities.

Board members reviewed the proposals without comment, indicating they stand a good chance of being approved when the board considers them in December. Housing fees would increase between 2.6 percent and 5.4 percent in the fall of 1997, depending on the university.

Annual rates would range from $3,316 at Pittsburg State University to $3,835 at Wichita State.

The increases in academic fees are relatively small, ranging from $2 to $9 per credit hour. Universities argued the increases were necessary to keep up with the costs of providing services. For example, residence halls are affected both by increasing food costs and a federal law increasing the minimum wage.

• SUSPECT IN SALINA TRIPLE MURDER TRACKED BY E-MAIL. FBI agents used e-mail messages as clues to the whereabouts of a man in Boston accused in the deaths of an 80-year-old woman, her daughter and her great-grandson in this central Kansas town.

The FBI had known since October that Alan White was in the Boston area because he sent e-mail from a business that provides Internet access to the public, Max Geiman, an FBI spokesman in Kansas City, Mo., said Wednesday.

SPORTS

• FITZSIMMONS TO FINISH NBA SEASON. The game plan was for Phoenix's Cotton Fitzsimmons to finish his 21st season in the NBA, then turn the Suns over to coach-in-waiting Danny Ainge. But with the Suns off to their worst start in 11 years, Fitzsimmons, former K-State basketball coach, might choose to move the timetable up. The Suns took an 0-7 record into Thursday night's game at Vancouver, trying to avoid a loss which would leave them one defeat shy of the worst start in franchise history.

• THREE NOMINATED FOR DICK BUTKUS AWARD. Canute Curtis of West Virginia, Pat Fitzgerald of Northwestern and Colorado's Matt Russell were nominated Thursday for the Dick Butkus award as college football's top linebacker. The three were chosen from a field of 11 semifinalists by a 25-member committee of sports writers and commentators making the selection for the Downtown Athletic Club of Orlando.

• HARRICK FIRED. Jim Harrick lied to UCLA officials eight separate times during their investigation of a recruiting dinner, according to an internal report released by the school. Harrick tried to get assistant coach Michael Holton to assist in a cover-up. Chancellor Charles Young said Harrick was fired primarily because he lied on several occasions, and tried to get an assistant coach to lie during an investigation into the expense report he filled out after a recruiting dinner. Harrick had been told a day earlier to resign or he would be fired.

Regents compare K-State to peers for Vision 2020

CHAD HELIN
staff reporter

President Jon Wefald told the Kansas Board of Regents at its meeting Thursday that it needs to be careful when it presents graduation statistics to the legislature for Vision 2020.

"Statistics don't always tell the whole story," Wefald said. "They don't suggest the culture from where they were derived."

Vision 2020 is the regents' plan to unify the reporting of key higher-education information to legislation.

The board discussed institution-specific indicators, a section of Vision 2020 that singles out regents schools and looks at things such as graduation rates.

It then compares them to peer schools, which are non-regents schools of comparable size.

Wefald said the comparisons the board used were not truly peers of the regents schools.

The board compared K-State to Colorado State University, Iowa State University, Oklahoma State University, Oregon State University and North Carolina State University.

Who's making the grade

Forty-five percent of students who enrolled at K-State in 1989 have graduated compared with an average of 59.6 percent at peer universities.

K-State	45%
Average of K-State's five peers	59.6%
Colorado State University	56%
Iowa State University	62%
Oklahoma State University	50%
Oregon State University	63%
North Carolina State University	67%

Source: NCAA Division I MEGAN LaRUE/Collegian

"It's like comparing apples and oranges," Wefald said. "All of these schools get more funding then we do.

"The board is comparing us to a North Carolina school," he said. "Never in a million years will a Kansas institution be funded like one in North Carolina."

New Collegian editor named; reader enjoyment targeted

SPEED

- Applications for Collegian news and advertising positions can be submitted in Kedzie 103.

CHAD HELIN
staff reporter

There will be a new face in the Collegian newsroom this spring, but not in the advertising office.

The Board of Student Publications named Kimberly Hefling as editor in chief of the Collegian for the spring semester in a personnel meeting Thursday.

Hefling, senior in print journalism and public relations, has worked on the Collegian for seven semesters and started out as a staff writer. She is currently the news editor.

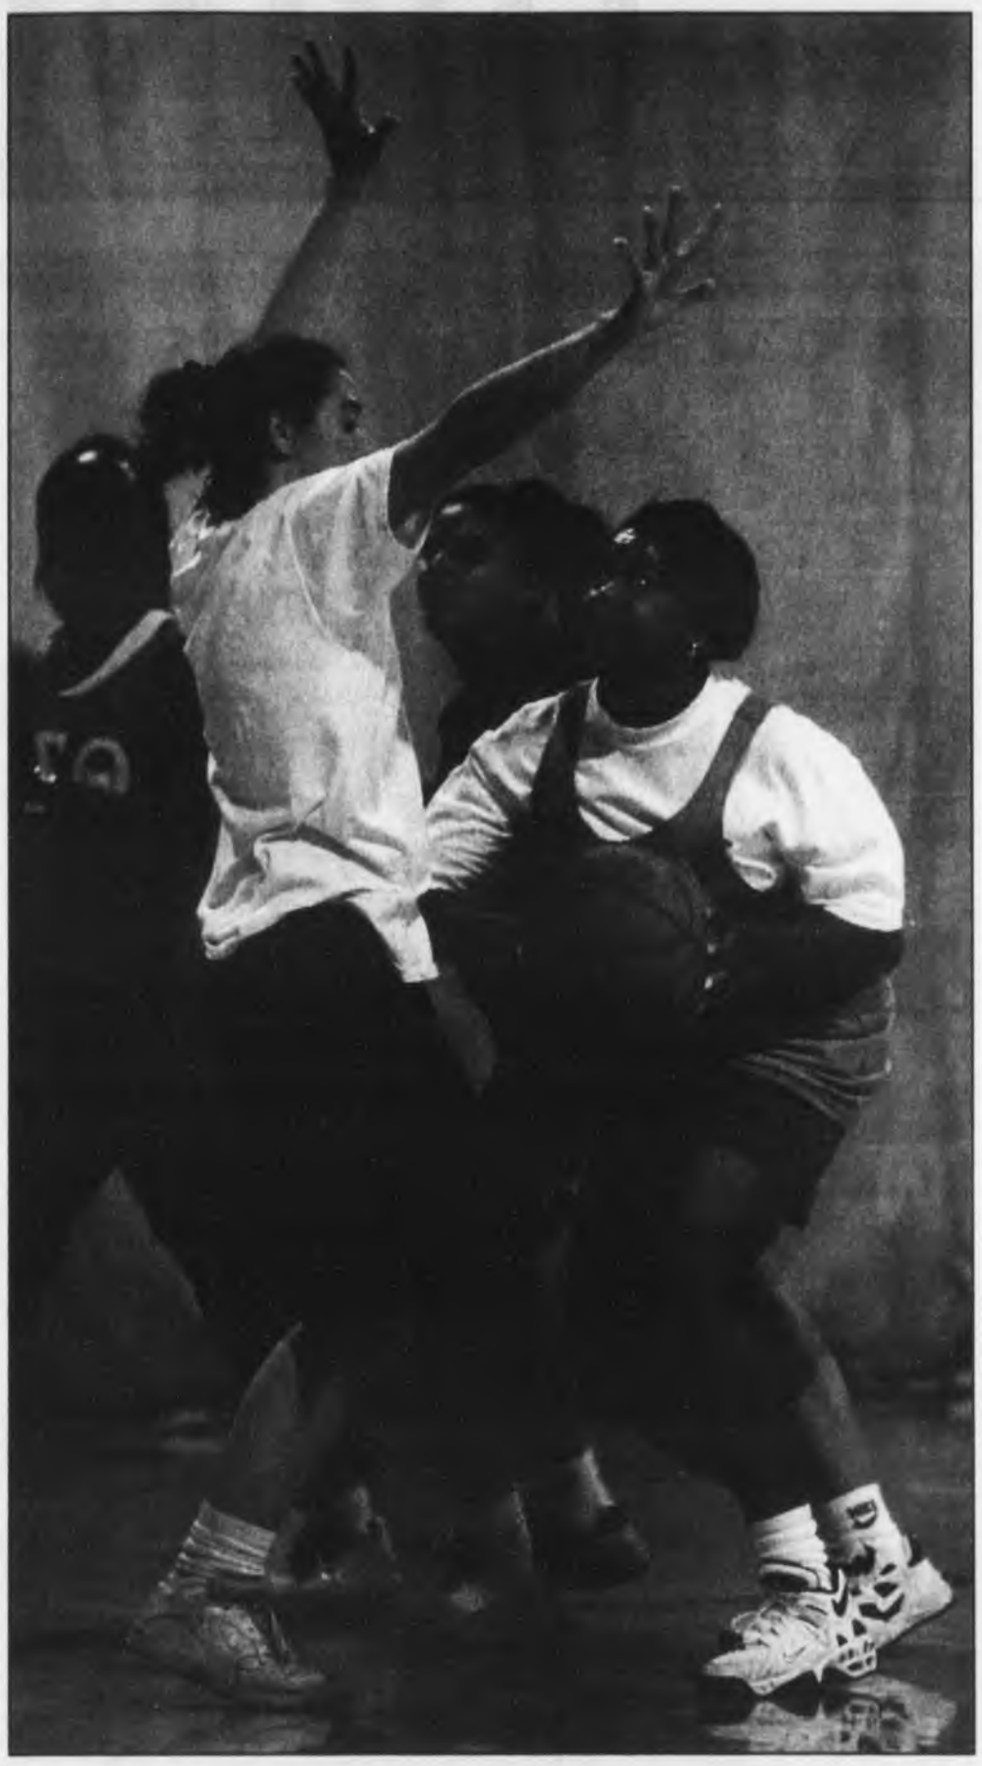
Hefling said improving story quality and getting more full-color editions are some of her goals.

"We're always looking for ways to increase readership," Hefling said. "I want readers to enjoy the paper."

Stacy Foulk, senior in marketing, was named advertising manager for the spring semester.

Foulk, who is currently the advertising manager, started working for the Collegian ad staff three semesters ago as a salesperson.

Foulk said advertising plays a bigger role in the quality of the paper than most students realize.



"A lot of students think of advertising in the Collegian as coupons and bar specials," Foulk said. "But the quality of ads we get directly affects the quality of the paper from day to day."

The board had originally planned to interview for the advertising assistant manager; however, it decided it would be better to let the manager choose an assistant.

"The board wanted to give more continuity to advertising," Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said. "It's a half-million-dollar operation."

Both Hefling and Foulk said they will begin hiring their staffs as soon as possible and encourage anyone interested to apply.

"The more applicants we get, the better staff we will have," Foulk said.

IN OUR OPINION

This could be a weekend of firsts for volleyball

Sometimes numbers can tell a story. But this weekend, the volleyball team hopes to prove some numbers don't tell the whole story.

WHY WE CARE

This weekend could be the first time for the Wildcats to beat Nebraska in volleyball and get a shot at the NCAA Tournament.

Let's take the number 53. Seems innocent enough until you realize that's the number of times K-State has lost to Nebraska in volleyball without winning.

Without ever winning.

The story seems simple, but it's evolving. The Wildcats came close to a rewrite in September, taking the Cornhuskers to five games in Lincoln before finally falling.

The time is ripe to take the next step — to write the next chapter.

Friday, the Cats will take the court against Nebraska for the 54th time in school history. It's time the story changes and changes for the better.

Saturday K-State will follow up with another big match, this one against Colorado.

The Buffaloes have dominated the series, but K-State has won two of the last three, including a five-game match in September that gave the Cats their first-ever win in Boulder.

A win either night brings K-State closer to rewriting another story. This story begins with zero — the number of times the Cats have played in the NCAA Tournament.

But K-State is ranked No. 20 in the nation, and we're rising among the nation's top 20 in attendance as well.

Stories continually evolve as faces change and characters develop in their roles. Your role is as a supporter.

For the Wildcats to write the next chapter, there must be background characters — and they need to make noise. Lots of noise. Hand-clapping, foot-stomping, ear-ringing noise.

And that's where you come in.

Great teams have come to K-State. But this might be the first season great volleyball has been played here. Steady progress has yielded exceptional results, and increased fan support has played a part.

Your place in history is reserved. Your time has come. Take your seat at 7 p.m. Friday and Saturday nights in Ahearn Field House, and take your place in the greatest story ever written — "The Rise of K-State Sports."

In Our Opinion, an editorial discussed and chosen by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board. For information on who is an editorial board member or how you can become a member, contact Sera Tank at (karolyi@ksu.edu).

THE INMATE

When the classroom becomes a prison

MY

Rhett HARTMAN

1. I get my test back, and I am disappointed.
2. I am disappointed, and it makes it hard to study.
3. I'm not motivated, and I don't study for my test.
4. Go to step 1.

These are the consequences for the people whose academic life does not match their imaginary life.

Imagine it. What if you didn't have to worry about scholarships or time or jobs or money? What if you didn't have to worry about drop-add or enrollment or requirements? In this magical world, you could do absolutely whatever interests you.

But that's not how the world works. I'm afraid there is a big, bad dog looking you in the face and telling you that you have to worry about these things. For it is these things that make our world go round. At least that's the excuse.

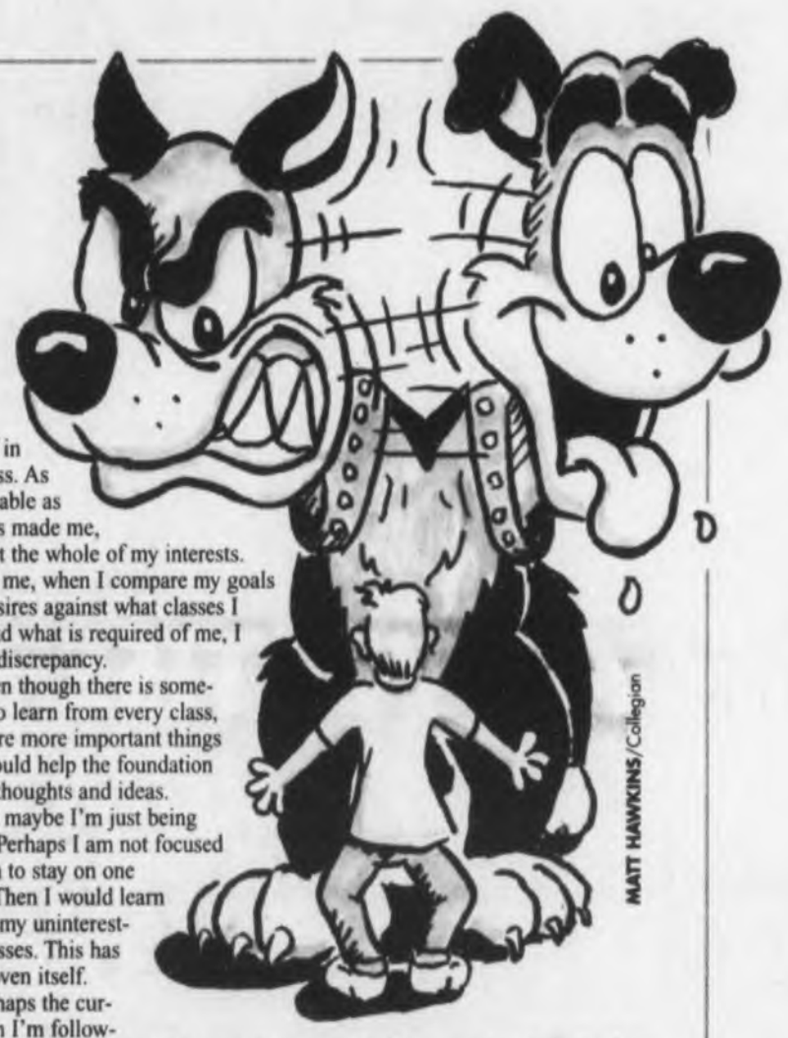
But every once in a while, the big, bad dog is not so bad. The strange world that you must conform to actually jives with your desires inside. The teacher can relate to you. It's a miracle!

This friendly dog goes so far as to give you a big lick on the face; you are enjoying one of your classes. Between what you would want to do and what you have to do, the worries that define the differences are not so great. Maybe classes are fun, and sometimes you even (gulp) look forward to going to them. What an alien concept.

But then the dog gets worms. Other classes are relentless. Or maybe a difficult part of your life coincides with an equally difficult midterm. Things are not looking up.

Neither your midterm nor your life goes as planned, and thoughts of a W cross your mind. Decisions have to be made. Priorities must be set.

But decisions and priorities are just more reflections from the differences between what you would like to do and what you have to do. We should be able to take all the fun classes and have enough time to learn something, but instead we have to take 16-plus hours and another semester without control over our teachers or curriculum.



If you cannot tell, enrollment has affected me.

As I am sitting in my room, a friend drops by to ask me some questions about her schedule next year. She doesn't want to make the same mistake of this semester, when her classes were painful to both her grade point average and her soul.

One of my roommates, for the first time, described to me the feeling of finally taking the classes that gave him reason to study.

A friend of mine who is majoring in German does not find herself typecast by her major and is pursuing a job in management and technology consulting.

What have I done to reconcile my raw desires with those of the big, bad dog? My major has been an attempt to ride the technology wave and immerse myself in business. As marketable as this has made me, it is not the whole of my interests.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

For me, when I compare my goals and desires against what classes I take and what is required of me, I find a discrepancy.

Even though there is something to learn from every class, there are more important things that would help the foundation of my thoughts and ideas.

But maybe I'm just being picky. Perhaps I am not focused enough to stay on one track. Then I would learn to like my uninteresting classes. This has not proven itself.

Perhaps the curriculum I'm following is too picky. Perhaps it is expecting me to conform my interests to its classes. If this is true, what can I do?

> "Yet the line between living and learning is a fine one. Until this separation is realized, students will drift among each other wearing their little arm floaties, maneuvered by the eddies of education."

If I start taking the classes that fit my internal curriculum, who would give me a degree? I mean, who wants to mess with all the bother of accrediting an individual student's ideas? What kind of crazy university is this?

But this is exactly what a university is for. For the majority of them, the students float lazily through their educational stream are happy. But there are a few who become bounded by the traditional educational system. These students have their time wasted learning inappropriate material.

But who are the students to tell the teachers what they should or shouldn't learn? These students came to the university to listen and learn, not mess up the status quo.

Yet the line between living and learning is a fine one. Until this separation is realized, students will drift among each other, wearing their little arm floaties, maneuvered by the eddies of education.

Rarely do they test the current to see the glorious banks along this river of knowledge; few are those who leave the security of what they are dealt.

It is only with effort the curriculum in our minds and the curriculum on paper begin to meet.

FRIENDS

When life sucks, they're there for you

MY

Jeremy STEPHENS

Reality 101.

Life sucks, and then your computer locks up.

This tends to especially occur right when you finish the largest paper you have ever written in your entire life.

And when you are weeping over the keyboard, among the first things you look for is a familiar face.

That's what friends are for.

Throughout life, most people will become acquainted with thousands of other people, most of whom will not be much more than a face and, if it happens to get put in long-term memory, a name.

But those few people with whom you come in contact and have enough in common to meet them again and again are given a special name.

Friend.

It's a term that describes those you turn to when you are down on your luck, have a problem that you can't solve or just want to be with someone you can trust.

It's an unexplainable phenomenon when a bond of friendship is created between two people.

Suddenly, the other person is no longer just another face on the street.

When you are stuck in traffic because someone's car broke down, you begin to have deep feelings of ill will for that person, until you arrive on the scene, and you find that it's one of your friends.

This person is no longer the guy who is clogging up traffic but a friend in need, and most people will do everything they can to help their friend.

Friends are people who are not interested in only helping themselves but also helping others, simply because they are friends.

And while this seems obvious to most, you'd be surprised at how many people unknowingly put work or school ahead of their friends.

This includes me.

This is not even close to a fair trade-off. In fact, it can make your life go bankrupt.

This might not apply to many of you now, but when you grow older, there will be a greater tendency to push aside friends, including family, to make room for the urgent project you have at work or school.

> "Liife is more than what's in front of you. I know this is true, but it's a hard philosophy to live by in a society that advocates individualism as the key to success."

But life is more than what's in front of you. I know this is true, but it's a hard philosophy to live by in a society that advocates individualism as the key to success.

Living and learning might be the best way to figure this out, but it is without a doubt the most costly.

Never forget a job is just a job, whether it's academic or commercial.

It will not be there to tell a joke when you are sobbing over your keyboard or be there for you during any of the other vastly more important things in life than a term paper or a computer program.

So which is worse — the man who is obsessed with his job or the job that obsesses the man?

I would say the man.

While a job can exist either in a school or at a company, a job does not have a mind of its own.

It exists in name only.

It cannot make decisions, fail to get things done or cause the man to be late for everything else in life.

It is when the man allows the job to become the highest priority in his life that great damage can occur.

Obsession with anything can cause the man to forget what is really important. Life is too short to let this happen to you.

This is especially true with close relationships.

Those friends who are closer to you than anyone else become almost like family.

They are the first to notice when you lose focus of what is important and often are the last to tell you that you have, because they don't want to harm you.

Finally, if a friend does come to you and mentions your priorities are not what they should be, be quick to listen and much slower to speak.

While no one likes bad news, it might be the best thing to happen to you, because no one likes a bad friend.

And to my friends who reminded me of these things and always knew what I should write about — this one's for you.

Thanks.

Thanks to adminstrators who helped with lighting in parking lot

Editor,

This letter is a public thank-you to Pat Bosco, dean of student life; Chuck Werring, director of Housing and Dining Services; Skyler Harper, housing and dining maintenance; and John Lambert, director of public safety, for their help to the residents of Marlatt Hall and all students of K-State.

For some time, the back parking lot of Marlatt has been the only lot on campus without lights. This posed an obvious threat to the safety of students and their property. In addition to Marlatt residents, there are many people who traverse our parking lot going to and from fraternities and apartments, as well as employees of Kramer Food Center who park in the lot.

Last semester, we had several vehicles broken into. When we attempted to have the situation addressed, we were told that our lot was slated to be recovered and have lighting installed in the summer of 1998. Try as we might, no one seemed able to offer us a solution sooner.

When we returned this semester, the Marlatt Hall Governing Board made this one of its top priorities. The most essential aspect of a good environment, whether it is one to live in or learn in, is that individuals feel secure. With this in mind, I arranged a meeting with Bosco. No sooner were the words out of my mouth than he was on the phone with Harper, attempting to remedy the situation.

There was a temporary contract signed with KPL Gas Service for lights and poles until the lot was redone. There were some delays, as will always be the case with large projects. But last Thursday, Nov. 7, our efforts finally came to fruition when five extremely bright lights were installed in our back parking lot.

So often, we students feel frustration when dealing with bureaucracies that seem cold and faceless. It is an immeasurable comfort to discover the bright and caring hearts that make up these departments and experience firsthand the concern they have for all of the students here at K-State. So, once again, to all those mentioned above and their associates who also helped to facilitate this, the residents of Marlatt wish to offer their most sincere gratitude.

Ryan Jensen

Crisis in homeland is a concern to Zairian Students of America

Editor,

Zaire, a central African country, has been in the news a lot lately. What is really happening in Zaire, and why so much negative publicity about this big, rich and beautiful country of ours?

Zaire is the former Belgian Congo, which became independent on June 30, 1960. Zaire was thereafter led by a democratically elected government: Joseph Kasa Vubu (president) and Patrice Lumumba (prime minister) until November 1965. On Nov. 24, 1965, Joseph Mobutu seized power through a coup.

I am writing this column today to express my concerns (as ZASAM president and political activist) regarding the crisis that has engulfed Zaire for the last two months.

More specifically, I am very concerned about the events that have developed in Zaire since Mobutu traveled to Switzerland to seek medical treatment for his prostate cancer.

Mobutu must resign his position as president of Zaire. Given that Mobutu forcibly imposed himself on the country as its leader after his term expired in 1991, and given his very weak health, I am asking Mobutu to resign immediately.

Leon Kengo Wa Dondo, the current prime minister, must be replaced by the Prime Minister-Elect Etienne Tshisekedi. Kengo has been supported by the United States and its allies despite his unpopularity in Zaire.

I urge the Clinton administration, France and Belgium to reverse their policy in this matter.

The international community should help us organize free and fair election. A true resolution of the crisis in Zaire requires free and fair elections, and I believe the people of Zaire, if given the opportunity, will select their leaders just as the people of Haiti, Benin and Bosnia did.

With regard to the conflict between Zaire and Rwanda, Mobutu has in the past year used the Rwandan refugee situation to prop himself up. His policies have created serious tensions at the borders between Zaire, Rwanda and Burundi. I strongly condemn recent attempts by Rwanda to arm some groups of people against the people of Zaire. Thus, I call upon the Rwandan leaders to abstain from further attacks on the people of Zaire, who are victims of a crisis they never sought nor supported.

I am finally asking the American people to be confident in their democratic system and to work for the democracy bill in other countries like Iraq, Cuba and Zaire. As we celebrate Zairian Nite Saturday at 6 p.m. at the International Student Center, I would like to invite all of you, our friends, to join us and learn more about Zaire, its people, its culture and its struggle toward democracy.

Tickets are being sold now at the International Student Center and the K-State Student Union.

Peace to all, and God bless you.

Mandatory insurance plan to be researched

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

After an hour of deliberations, the Student Health Advisory Committee decided to support further research of the mandatory-with-waiver insurance plan.

The health-insurance plan being reviewed would cost about $370 per student, nearly one-third of the current cost of $987.

However, the insurance would only directly affect incoming freshmen. Students already at K-State would have the option of enrolling in the plan but would not be required.

The waiver would allow students who are already covered by another insurance plan to be exempt from the mandatory program as long as they can show proof of insurance.

> "If we cut off looking at mandatory insurance, then there's a chance of decreasing premiums for insurance."
> • JULIE TARARA
> DOCTORAL STUDENT IN AGRONOMY

It was a close vote, with five members for the mandatory-with-waiver plan, three against it and one member abstaining.

SHAC members should work to get a plan that will decrease premiums and give students the best coverage, Kristin McDonald, junior in kinesiology, said.

"We should be pro-insurance, not necessarily pro-mandatory insurance," said Amy Martin, junior in animal science and industry.

SHAC members said they agreed students should be educated about insurance regardless of whether it is mandatory.

SHAC should impress upon students the importance of having insurance, McDonald said.

Most of the SHAC members said they agreed students need some form of insurance whether it is mandated or not.

"If we cut off looking at mandatory insurance, then there's less chance of decreasing premiums for insurance," Julie Tarara, doctoral student in agronomy, said.

Others said they thought the program had a better chance if other campus groups supported it.

"It would be a good idea to get a feel if we have backers. If they favor the idea, then we could determine the feasibility," Fred Newton, director of University Counseling Services, said.

Recently, SHAC has created an insurance timeline to keep track of the insurance research progress. Next week, the SHAC insurance committee will be finalizing plans for soliciting bids, said Amy Donahy, SHAC chairwoman and junior in English.

On Dec. 5, the insurance committee will present the bids during the regular SHAC meeting and get feedback from the members.

Following the feedback session, bids for different student insurance plans will then be mailed out. The SHAC insurance committee is hopeful bids will be returned by the beginning of next semester, Donahy said.

The Kansas Board of Regents is not prepared to act on the regents-wide health-insurance plan, either.

"The regents-wide plan is at a stand-still, because they are running out of time because of term ends," Donahy said.

The insurance plan is a concern that should be expressed to the new student body president, Donahy said, because K-State won't be looking at implementing a new student plan until next year.

"We will continue to work for next year. I don't think that it is realistic for this year," Donahy said.

British champions win American audience at 'Yankees Should Go Home' debate

MIRANDA KENNEDY
staff reporter

A Scotsman and an Australian-turned-Englishwoman affirmed the resolution that Yankees should go home, said an audience that was mostly high-school debaters Thursday.

Audience members voted by applause and decided these two British national champions won the debate in Nichols Theatre.

The British debaters, Stephen Magee and Simone Murray, said they were proving the United States should stop taking over the world with its cultural and military imperialism.

Murray and Magee often referred to "Baywatch."

"Pamela Anderson gave blow-up dolls everywhere an unparalleled sense of realism," Murray said.

She also called America the country that demanded that the Scottish movie "Trainspotting" be dubbed so the entire cast sounded like it lived on Melrose Place.

Magee said in his first affirmative constructive speech that Great Britain has a strong advantage in sports.

"What sports did Britain offer to the world?" he asked. "Cricket, rugby — manly sports. Sports that go on for five days.

"What sports did the U.S. offer to the world? The World Wrestling Federation," he said.

K.J. Wall, 1993 U.S. national debate champion and K-State alumnus, said in his first negative constructive speech that he took the WWF insult personally.

"Our military would not be as strong as it is today if children did not grow up watching that and learning how to fight," he said.

Wall also responded to the British debaters' claim that America's fast-food chains are taking over the world.

"I just think we're trying to maintain a system and a country that can be free of mad-cow disease," he said.

Rich McCollum, 1991 U.S. national debate champion and K-State alumnus, said McDonald's is a healthy symbol of capitalism.

"Every child in America and worldwide deserves to have Mayor McCheese as a hero," McCollum said.

He said "Baywatch" is another symbol of capitalism. "It's a sign of a fledgling silicone industry in America," he said.

During the audience's questions, an audience member asked Magee what he would do if he were propositioned by "Baywatch" actor Pamela Anderson.

JILL JARSULIC/Collegian

STEPHEN MAGEE, British national champion debater, speaks to K.J. Wall, former U.S. national champion, during an International Parliamentary-style debate titled "Yankees Should Go Home."

"I just have this terrible image of Tommy Lee and a chain saw," he said. "I would have to run screaming."

In addressing U.S. foreign policy, Magee said it just doesn't work. He said it is fundamentally unjust, because it punishes different countries differently for the same offenses.

"You indict the inconsistencies of these policies?" McCollum asked him during cross-examination. "You're a debater, right? And you've got a problem with inconsistencies?"

Magee answered, "I'm a British debater."

And he emphasized British.

In his first negative constructive speech, Wall gave an example of British foreign policy.

"An example of British foreign policy is taking their Navy across the world to conquer the Faulkland Islands, which is maybe bigger than Bramlage Coliseum," he said.

Before the debate began, Murray said its style, which was British parliamentary debate, is different from policy debate.

"The emphasis is on being witty, being impromptu," she said. "Not so much detailed research as informed general knowledge."

She said the most important thing is the debaters' relationship with the audience.

"You've got to constantly try to appeal to them, win them over," she said.

The British debaters have been touring the United States for two months. This was the 29th and final debate of their tour.

"That's a lot of debating, and it starts to affect the way you speak," Murray said. "We'll be on the plane, and it will be like, 'Stephen, I've got two points. One, can I have some of your coffee? And two, are you done reading the newspaper?'"

Cats head to Buffalo-land

contributing writer

For the second-straight year, K-State will play one of its biggest games of the year against the Colorado Buffaloes.

With bowl implications surrounding the game, the Cats will try to improve their record (8-1, 5-1) with a win over the Buffaloes (8-1, 6-0) in Boulder.

The Cats go to Boulder with the momentum of a 38-12 road win against Kansas. With the win, the Cats improved to No. 9 in both polls.

The Buffaloes, on the other hand, come into the game off a lackluster performance against Iowa State. The Buffaloes trailed midway through the third quarter, 28-21. But in a span of 13:55, the Buffaloes scored four touchdowns to build a 49-28 lead. An explosive offense that can strike at any time is a concern for the Cats.

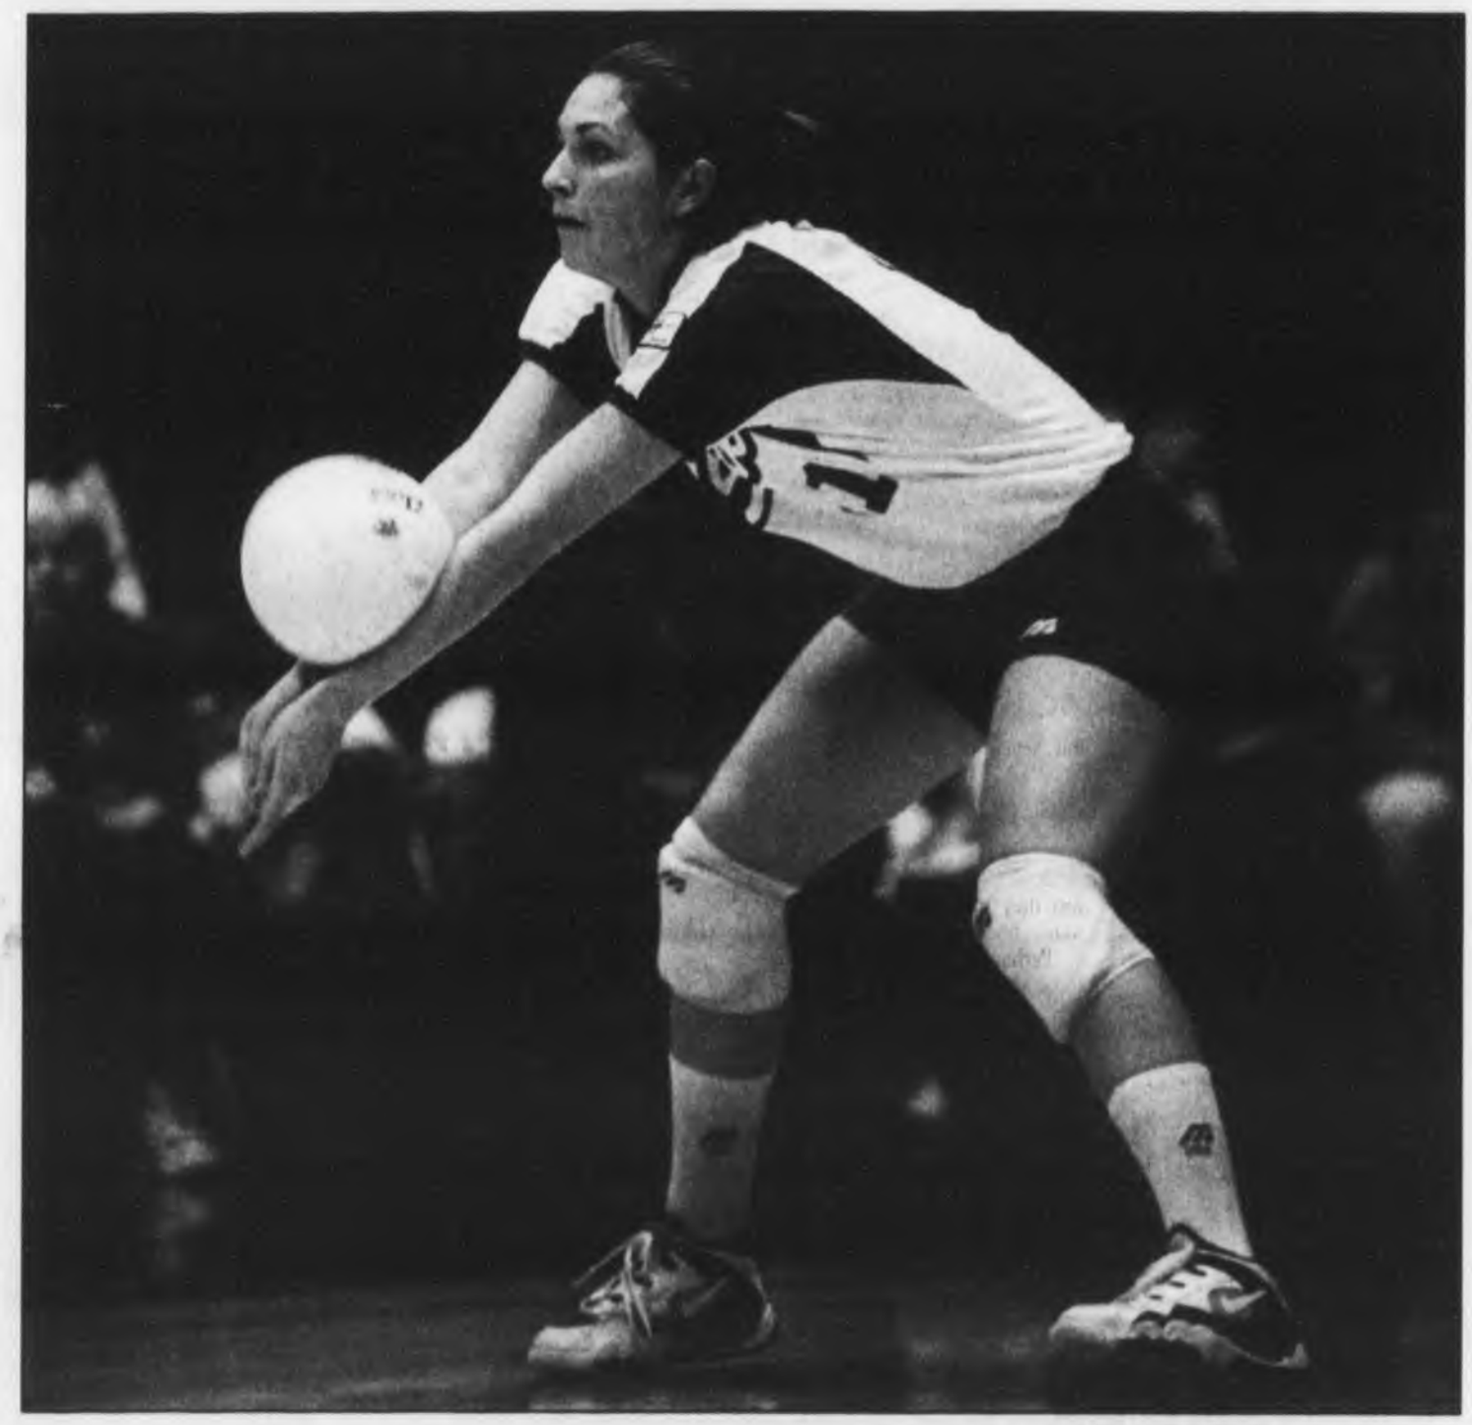
"They have an excellent pass offense," Coach Bill Snyder said. "They run their schemes very well, and they have great personnel."

Part of the Buffaloes' great personnel is quarterback Koy Detmer. Against the Cyclones, Detmer passed for more than 400 yards and five touchdowns. He ranks fifth in the nation in pass efficiency.

"He's a tremendous quarterback. I really like the way he plays," Snyder said. "He is really a threat with the ball, and he can make big plays."

But sometimes overlooked in the Buffaloes' offense is the quality of depth at the wide-receiver position.

Senior Rae Carruth leads the team in receptions with 47, but Detmer has the ability to spread the ball to many receivers. Six other receivers have reached the double-digit mark in receptions this season.



"They have some great speed and size at the wide-receiver position," Snyder said. "All of them run like the wind."

The size aspect comes with wide receiver Phil Savoy. At 6'3", Savoy could cause some problems for the smaller Cat cornerbacks. Against Missouri, Savoy grabbed five catches for 117 yards. A 6'2" Isaac Byrd accumulated nine catches for 178 yards last week against the Cat secondary.

To ease the pressure on the secondary, the Cats will have to pressure Detmer. Against the Jayhawks last week, the Cat defense sacked the quarterback seven times.

"You better have some pressure on Colorado. You don't defend the pass well without it," Snyder said. "But you have to lay off and cover at times also. The key is keeping them guessing and off balance."

Saturday's game at Folsom Field has a 6 p.m. kickoff and will be televised on Foxsports Network.

No. 5 Nebraska and powerhouse Colorado visit K-State Saturday. The Cats are prepared for

JOHN BERGOREN
sports writer

Tonight's contest could be the biggest game in K-State volleyball history.

The No. 20 Wildcats, 22-5 overall and 10-4 in conference play, will go head-to-head with No. 5 Nebraska (21-3, 13-1) at 7 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

The Cats have never defeated the Huskers and are 0-53 since the schools' first meeting. Not only is the losing streak on the line, but with a win, K-State could pick move into position to get a bye in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

With all that on the line, Coach Jim Moore said the Wildcats are ready for the big game.

"I feel this is a confident team," Moore said. "I don't know that we're confident that we can beat Nebraska, but I think we're a confident team.

"I think we're pretty excited for the game. There isn't a single human being in this program who isn't sick and tired of hearing when are we going to beat Nebraska."

Obviously, Nebraska won't be an easy task for the Cats, but K-State almost pulled off the upset feat earlier this season in Lincoln, taking the Cornhuskers to five games.

"They're a very solid team," Moore said. "They may be the best defensive team in the country. They dig balls to targets better than anyone I've ever seen. But that's not all they do, or they wouldn't be where they are now."

The Wildcats will also tangle with Colorado at 7 p.m. Saturday. Colorado comes into the match with a 13-8, 8-6 record and will be looking to get even with the Cats.

In the teams' first meeting, K-State took it to the line, winning 3-2 in Boulder.

Both matches are free to students with a student ID.

There is a $3 admission charge for adults and $1 for children high-school age and younger.

Districts await K-State runners

JON BALMER
sports writer

The K-State men's and women's cross country teams resume action Saturday when they compete in the NCAA District Five Regionals at Bradley University in Peoria, Ill.

The team's performances in the meet will decide whether they advance further in the championships.

While opposing schools such as Missouri and Nebraska will provide tough competition for the Cats, predicted rain and cold temperatures also look to challenge the squad.

"I believe everybody, at some point in their career, will have to run bad weather," Coach Terry Drake said. "It's my job to get them excited about the opportunity and work it to our advantage."

The men's team enters the race seeded fifth and will run in a field Drake said his team could do well against. However, Drake said he thinks his biggest challenge for regionals was getting the team prepared for running a 10,000-meter race.

"I've been drilling it into their mind all week that they have to pace themselves in a race this length," Drake said.

For the women's squad, the element of motivation will play an important role. The team is seeded ninth, a ranking Drake felt was unjustly deserved.

"I guarantee we will finish higher than where they have us currently," Drake said.

"The desire to prove this wrong could help us in the long run."

With only the top two teams from each side guaranteed advancement, the Cats will have to come up big to move into the next round. Regardless of the outcome, Drake said he would be happy with the Cats' showing if they give their best effort.

"If the teams run their best and can honestly say they gave it their all, I will be satisfied," Drake said.

Former Cat players attracting attention in NFL as K-State builds its program

As success has grown with the K-State football team over the years, more players have found their way to the playing field of the National Football League.

There were even players who made it to the NFL when the Wildcats struggled through their losing years. The names of Paul Coffman, Steve Grogan and Lynn Dickey might ring a bell.

Shane MCCORMICK

But as success and notoriety grow with the program, more teams are paying attention to Cat players.

Some of the recent Cat players who have made it include the following:

Elijah Alexander — Alexander fell into the Tampa Bay Buccaneers' laps in the 10th round of the 1992 draft. After life in Tampa Bay, Alexander moved on to Denver. In 1995, Alexander led the Broncos in tackles. This year, Alexander's home is with the Indianapolis Colts.

Chad May — May was selected in the fourth round of the 1994 NFL draft by the Minnesota Vikings after the 1994 season. After spending a year of being Mr. Clipboard Man with the Vikings, May was cut by the Vikes after this year's preseason. But once again, May has found his way to the top. Just recently, May was picked up by the Arizona Cardinals. There, he will take on his role as Mr. Clipboard Man as he serves as the Cardinals' third-string quarterback.

Andre Coleman — Coleman was taken as the 70th overall pick in the 1994 draft by the San Diego Chargers. He was selected to the 1995 all-rookie team. It was in the Super Bowl where he showed off his capabilities. In that contest against the San Francisco 49ers, Coleman returned eight kickoff returns for 242 yards (both Super Bowl records). Included in those returns was a 98-yard return for a touchdown. Just last Monday night against Detroit, Coleman caught the 1,000th touchdown pass on Monday Night Football.

Barrett Brooks — Taken in the second round of the 1995 draft, Brooks has established himself as a starting offensive lineman for the Philadelphia Eagles. With his size and quick feet, Brooks should find a home in the NFL for a while.

Thomas Randolph — The New York Giants took Randolph in the second round of the 1994 draft. During his first couple of years, Randolph won the starting position at cornerback. But recently, he has lost that starting position and is coming in on certain package situations.

Mitch Running — Running survived spring training this year with the Houston Oilers and made the team's practice squad. Teams are always looking for a possession-type wide receiver like Running. Add his special-teams abilities, and Running reminds many people of Buffalo Bill great Steve Tasker.

So whom could we look for to make it to the NFL out of this year's Cats?

If cornerback Chris Canty decides to come out early, he will definitely be one of the best available at his position. Teams are always looking for quality players at the corner position. If Canty forgoes his final year, look for him to be taken in the first round of the draft.

NFL draft experts have Kevin Lockett as one of the top wide receivers coming into this year's draft. Lockett's sure hands and big-play potential will attract many teams. If he falls into the second round, he could be the steal of the draft.

NFL scouts might think Nyle Wiren is too small for a defensive end, but you cannot overlook his tenacity on the field. Whether it is at the end position or elsewhere, some team will find a spot for Wiren.

Also listen for the names of center Jason Johnson, free safety Mario Smith and linebacker DeShawn Fogle to be called on draft day.

Shane McCormick is a senior in radio/television. He can be reached by e-mail at (shanem@ksu.edu).

Final preseason match-up might be harder for Cats

JOHN BERGOREN
sports writer

The K-State men's basketball team will play its last preseason game at 7 tonight against the Adelaide 36ers, a professional team from Australia.

The Wildcats are coming off an 80-63 win against the NBC Thunder Camps last Friday, but tonight's game promises to be a tougher match.

The 36ers are fresh off a double overtime loss to Michigan and another close game against Purdue.

Coach Tom Asbury said tonight's opponent has a lot of different looks to present the Cats.

"We're going to play against a lot of different defenses and a team that shoots extremely well on the perimeter and in transition," he said.

"They have some deep, deep range, and we're going to have to really get out on them."

A look at last year's stats shows the the 36ers live and die by running the ball. They averaged 100 points per game while allowing 98 and finished with a 16-10 regular season record.

Playing a good team is what Asbury said the Cats need.

"I don't think it helps us to whip teams in preseason," Asbury said.

"Sometimes you beat those touring teams 100-50, and that doesn't help anybody."

Tickets for tonight's game are on sale for $5 at the Bramlage Coliseum ticket office during business hours or at the door.

This will be the Cats' last preseason matchup before launching into their regular season campaign Nov. 22 against UMKC.

K-State tips off season with Sunday exhibition

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Nearly one month after its first practice, the K-State's women's basketball team will finally get the chance to play Sunday when Uralmash, a club team from Russia, comes to open the exhibition season.

The game will serve as an introduction of sorts for everyone involved. First-year coach Deb Patterson will get to introduce her game to K-State fans, and the players, whom Patterson has never seen in competition, will get to introduce themselves to their coach.

The Wildcats have done little to prepare for Uralmash specifically, spending more time on polishing fundamentals on offense and defense.

With a new coach and a new team, much of the emphasis will be on playing together and gaining game experience.

"We haven't talked much about the other team," senior forward Andria Jones said. "We're doing more just preparing ourselves, working on getting the offense and the defense down."

But the Cats' primary concern is preparing for the season opener against Memphis Nov. 22.

Jones said although the team is progressing well, some things have gone slowly, simply because everyone — including fellow seniors Missy Decker, Kjersten Larson and Kayla Hester — is coming in new.

"It's harder for Missy and KJ and I, because we've had the same thing pounded into us for three years," Jones said. "Now everyone is on the same page. We're all starting new."

Tip-off is at 2 p.m. Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Students are admitted free with a valid student ID.

staff reporter

"The Lurker Files: Faceless," by Scott Ciencin, is perhaps the most confused book I have ever read. Not confusing, but confused.

The storyline goes like this. Gia Gibson is a freshman at Wintervale University, and she is an Internet addict.

She talks with all kinds of potential weirdos in chat rooms on the university Net. Eventually she ends up the victim of a detailed scandal that ruins lives of not one but seven or more college students.

At the center of all the lies spread about Gibson is the Lurker, the evil villain.

People don't cross the Lurker lest they have their lives ruined, too.

Perhaps the most interesting thing about the Lurker is that even his closest cronies have not seen the Lurker's face or met the Lurker in person.

This must be the Uni-Lurker, who finds out dirt on anyone and everyone but does it anonymously. The Lurker blackmails nearly everyone on campus into doing his evil biddings. Interesting, yet crappy.

So goes the tale of blackmail, deceit and all kinds of general unfriendliness.

In the end, Gibson decides she wants to bring down the Lurker, who has hurt so many of her friends.

The author promises that one day the mask will fall, and we will all know the Lurker's true identity.

Well, so what.

Let me explain why the author who wrote this book might be confused.

The book's format is written as if it were appearing on a computer screen.

The book is printed in a Courier-looking font (similar to typewriter type), and conversations with fake chat names are written as if they were online.

I'm a book person. I want to be able to read well-written, artistic literature.

If necessary, I'd like to be able to take it to the toilet with me. And while Ciencin's book is mobile, it's not the kind of writing I would usually read.

I take reading time very seriously, because I never have any of it. So when I read a mediocre book, with a not-so-paper-friendly format, I get a little hostile.

This book wasn't all bad. It comes with a disk and has a World Wide Web page (http://www.randomhouse.com/lurkerfiles/). I thought the Web page was pretty decent.

But then again, this book really belongs on the Web more than in print.

Technofreaks will probably be the only people who think this book is worth reading, probably because they have to go to the bathroom and can't take their modems, hard drives and monitors with them.

I'm not sure of the author's intentions when he decided to write this book.

Some books like this are to show the evils of technology. Some books like this are in existence to praise technology. Instead, we see an author with a vague knowledge of the evils of technology.

The author also introduces us to a set of characters in their 20s who have wholeheartedly accepted technology and let people use it to ruin their lives.

Throughout the entire book, while the heroine is being abused online, she never really thinks, "Hey, if I weren't online, these people couldn't harass me like this." I guess some people just haven't figured out that if you don't like what you see on the Internet, you don't have to boot up the computer.

Rodeo-club competitions bring top bullriders to town

DAVE KATZER
staff reporter

Weber Arena will come alive this weekend with the clanging of chute gates, the chatter of bullriders and roars from the crowd. The K-State Rodeo Club will be host to the inaugural Challenge of the Champions Friday night and the second annual Bullmania Saturday night in Weber.

The two events will pit top bullriders from around the Midwest against the best bucking bulls that four different stock contractors have to offer.

"We've got some of the best bulls in the country here for this. These bulls have bucked off world champions like Tuff Hedeman and Jerome Davis," said Justin Lynn, senior in animal science and Rodeo Club president.

The Challenge of Champions is an invitation-only production. Only those bullriders in the top five of their regional or association standings were asked to compete. Each cowboy will compete on two bulls. The cowboy with the highest cumulative score will win the event.

Members from amateur associations in Kansas and Nebraska, along with the top five individuals from the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association's Prairie Circuit and the National Intercollegiate Rodeo Association's Central Plains Region, were invited. In all, 25 cowboys will compete on 50 bulls for $6,000 in prize money and a trophy buckle.

Lynn said one of the highlights of the Challenge would be Ray Wessel. Wessel, who won last year's Bullmania, is a K-State alumnus who is ranked in the top 15 of the PRCA world standings. If he remains in the top 15, he will make his second trip to the National Finals Rodeo this December in Las Vegas.

Jimmy Morris, former International Professional Rodeo Association champion, will be competing in the Bullmania competition.

Wessel is the only NFR veteran in the field, but Lynn said there is a lot of talent coming to the event.

"When planning this bull-riding, we wanted to design it so we could showcase young, up-and-coming cowboys from both the amateur and professional ranks," Lynn said.

Bullmania has 40 competitors. All the cowboys will ride in the first go-round, and the top 10 cowboys will advance to the short round. The highest cumulative score on two bulls will determine the winner.

There is $2,000 in added money, money provided by the promoters in addition to the cowboys' entry fees for Bullmania. Cowboys will pay $100 in fees to compete for a check in both rounds and the average.

Both events will feature more than just talented cowboys. Justin McKee, a K-State alumnus and PRCA announcer, will call the action. John McDonald, who has provided stock for the Bull Riders Only series on television, will be one of the four contractors. Rumford, J.C. and the DeLayne Long rodeo companies will also be bringing bulls.

K-State rodeo coach Steve Frazier said the event wasn't easy to plan.

"It took a lot of phone calls to the members of the different associations. The club members have done an excellent job of setting up the arena and taking care of the posters and the tickets," Frazier said.

Frazier said spectators would get their money's worth.

"It is the most dangerous sport in the world, and people like to watch it. It's a special bull-riding, with special animals and cowboys. People will get a lot of bang for their buck at these bull-ridings," he said.

The Challenge of the Champions is Friday night, and Bullmania is Saturday night in Weber. Both performances start at 7:30. Tickets for adults are $10 at the door and $8 in advance. Student prices are $10 and $7. Children's tickets are $5 and $4, and any child younger than 5 years old will be admitted free. For more information, call Frazier at 539-8585.

Cowboy lingo for rodeo-impaired

People often don't understand exactly what cowboys are saying. This cowboy jargon will be a part of the Challenge of the Champions and Bullmania. These are bull-riding events the K-State Rodeo Club is bringing to Weber Arena Friday and Saturday night. The following list of words and terms might appear foreign to the average spectator.

Muley – simply a bull without horns
Banana horn – a bull with loosely attached horns that often flop while he is bucking
Hookin' – when a cowboy is butted with the bull's head or horns
Hang-up – when a cowboy's hand remains in the rope after he is bucked off.
Chili-whopped – when a cowboy is rendered unconscious or severely dazed
The well – the inside of a bull's spin. The momentum of a bull's spin will often bring a cowboy down into the well.
Turn back – When a bull spins, he is turning back, either to the left or the right
Jump-and-kick – the bucking motion of a bull, often used to describe a bull that does not turn back
Re-ride – A cowboy is given another bull if his animal stops, falls down or fouls him at the chute gate.
Cover – to make a qualified ride
Open up – when a cowboy spurs the bull for extra points, displaying superior control and style.
Chaps – Pronounced shaps, they are used for protection and for show.
Bull rope – a flat, braided rope with a handle
Bells – used as weight to pull the bull rope off the bull when the cowboy is off the bull, not for noise.
Long-go – the first round of competition, in which all the cowboys compete Short-go – similar to a finals. Only a selected number advance into the short-go.
Average – the cumulative score from the previous rounds

Blue Key society thanks campus leaders

CHRIS DEAN
staff reporter

More than 100 campus leaders were thanked for their commitment and dedication to K-State at a reception Thursday night.

Blue Key honor society sponsored the event as a way to thank campus leaders for their contributions to K-State. The presidents of all organizations registered with the Office of Student Activities and Services, as well as members of Student Senate and the Student Alumni Board, were invited to attend the reception in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"This evening is part of Leadership Appreciation Day," said Angela Siefkes, co-director of Leadership Appreciation Day for Blue Key and senior in civil engineering. "We wanted to recognize, celebrate and promote the K-State tradition of leadership."

The student leaders were given K-State pins and had the option of socializing or touring the new art museum before the speakers began.

Many of the students said they had not yet been in the art museum and were glad to have the opportunity to tour it. Bob Kohl, president of Golden Key National Honor Society, said he liked that the reception was on campus.

"Last year, it was at the Ramada. This is a different atmosphere," he said. "As campus leaders, we are on our home turf."

Elizabeth Van Goethen, president of Engineering Ambassadors, said the socializing aspect of the night was good, because it gave her a chance to talk to other campus leaders.

"It's a great opportunity to emphasize leadership," she said. "As a president, you sometimes feel you are the only one who cares anymore. It's nice to see other people are working just as hard for what they care about."

The speakers for the event were Bob Krause, University vice president, and Tim Riemann, president of the Student Alumni Board. The two were introduced by Student Body President Chris Hansen.

Krause thanked the students for their contributions to K-State, and Riemann spoke about what it takes to be a campus leader.

"There are a few positions where you can leave your mark at K-State," Riemann said, "but there are a thousand different ways to make a difference here, and by the number of people here tonight, and the people I have talked to, I think we are all on the right track."

Riemann also addressed the ample opportunities a K-State student has to become involved.

"It's the one place where you can watch a campus leader work his way up to the top and never fall down," Riemann said. "They just graduate."

Riemann said that as a junior in agricultural economics, speaking at a senior honorary's reception was flattering, and he was not nervous.

"The fact that a person could go into any group on campus and get respect typifies the attitude at K-State," he said. "I consider all these people my friends, and so it was just like talking to a group of friends."

camps without the help of professional armies.

"These soldiers of fortune are trying to take power 800 miles from the city," Emizet said. "If they want to take power, they must do it in the capital city."

Tubene said the only way Mobutu will resign as governor would be through the help of the United States and other allies.

"This dictator has to be pushed out by some other power," Tubene said.

Mobutu was put in power in 1965 by the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States, which has tried to keep Mobutu there ever since then, said Emizet.

"After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the U.S. tried to remove Mobutu but they didn't try hard enough," Emizet said.

He also said the United States saw Mobutu was corrupting the people of Zaire but could not remove him from his presidency, because he had already established a strong military coalition.

"They let Mobutu dictate every event, and now the preventative diplomacy policy has failed," Emizet said.

Mobutu's term actually expired in 1990, but Tubene said Mobutu has tricked the elections every year.

"As a citizen, I believe the wave of democracy should be supported by the U.S.," Emizet said.

He said the only way Mobutu could be removed from power would be through help from the international community, especially the United States, France and Belgium.

"We have let Mobutu stay in power. It is everybody's fault," he said. "The United Nations needs to restore ethnic order and social conflict in Zaire like they did back in 1960."

Emizet said in 1960 Zaire was one of the richest countries in Africa. They were prosperous, they had clean water, and they had roads to get around on.

"Now we have nothing. This is just an example of how Mobutu has ruined Zaire," he said.

Some of the people of Zaire said they think the one way to get Mobutu out of power is through an election.

"We need to have a free and fair election in 1997 and put Mobutu out of power," Tubene said. "The U.S. and other allies need to intervene to help us ensure that we can do this."

Emizet said he thought the problem with the current election process is the logistics.

"I wish Zaire would start electing at the grass-roots level," Emizet said. "The best process is to start electing at the county level and then slowly work our way up to the president."

Emizet said there are many qualified people in Zaire who could get the country back on track, but it would take years to build the economic development of the country.

"We need someone to create a strong coalition within the opposition and restore economic development," he said.

burn his draft card or fight for his country.

Claude and his tribe of hippies sang songs of freedom and told the audience of their protest to the Vietnam War. The characters often addressed the audience directly in their dialogue.

To give an idea of how monumental "Hair" really is, many of the songs are recognizable to even a person who doesn't know about '60s music. "Aquarius," "Sodomy" and "The Flesh Failures (Let the Sun Shine In)" were just a few of the numerous songs performed.

The costumes, songs, music, stage setting and acting were all great. They all made the performance exciting to watch, for lack of a better word. In fact, afterwards, it felt as if I had experienced the hippie movement in the '60s.

Erik Hogan, who played Claude, said he was overwhelmed after performing such a controversial and monumental production.

"It's charging and refreshing, actually. It's very exhilarating," Hogan said.

Hogan, junior in music theater, said there were a few problems with the opening night.

There were a couple times in the production when the microphone shut off on the soloists, making it virtually impossible to hear.

Apart from that, though, the musical was a complete success. Everyone should to go to Friday and Saturday's 8 p.m. performances.

earliest on authorizing the international force. In addition to Canada and the United States, the force of 10,000-12,000 people is expected to include troops from France, Britain, Spain, South Africa and several other nations.

Among the differences to be resolved before U.N. authorization is the duration of the mission. Canada has recommended the force remain in Zaire for six months. The United States wants a four-month mandate.

Given reports of shelling and skirmishes near Goma, which the United States wants to secure as a base for humanitarian operations, Senate Republicans were quick to express concern about the dangers of the proposed mission.

SENATE

"We go through and weed out those who don't meet the criteria, and we prioritize," Otto said.

The only senator to vote against the bill was Sean Tomb, arts and sciences senator.

"There's just a lot of people that are concerned about not giving money to minorities at the college level," Tomb said, adding that funding for minorities had already been cut at the department level.

Many attributed the speedy meeting to the efficiency of the EOF committee and its chair.

"I think it's pretty impressive that the senators respect the opinion of the EOF committee that much," Chris Webster, engineering senator, said.

Others commended Senate on doing research on the bill before it came up for debate to cut down on uniformed motions and amendments.

On the other hand, senators such as Lach Franquemont, arts and sciences senator, said the Senate was too inconsistent in its debating.

"We spent one hour on a $36 allocation, two hours on $703, seven hours on $2,000, and we spent 15 minutes on a $206,000 allocation. Just think about that," Franquemont said.

Otto said this was just a sign of good work on the senators' parts.

"I would be concerned, other than the fact that there were a lot of people who did their research," Otto said.

Finished with second readings by 8:30 p.m., Senate also heard first readings on a proposed amendment to the constitution which would give the allocations chairperson ultimate authority to interpret funding regulations.

Flood of refugees returns to Zaire

■ 3-day refugee exodus to Rwanda slows down as aid workers mobilize to help resettlement.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GISENYI, Rwanda — The biggest, fastest homecoming of refugees in history slowed late Sunday after three days in which at least a half-million Rwandan Hutus returned from 2-1/2 years in exile in Zaire.

Wearied by their long walk home, families stopped to camp in clusters for 25 miles along the main road east of the Lake Kivu border town of Gisenyi.

As night fell, U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees spokesman Ray Wilkinson said most of the remaining 100,000 stragglers — the very old, the very young and the sick — were being taken across the border by truck.

"The exodus from North Kivu should be over," he said.

In Geneva, UNHCR spokesman Fernando del Mundo said the refugee migration was unprecedented.

"This is the largest, swiftest movement of refugees back home that we've ever seen," he said.

More Kurdish refugees — about 1.5 million — returned from Turkey and Iran to Iraq when the United States set up a safe haven for them in May 1991, but at a much slower rate, he said.

In Rwanda, aid workers mobilized to help resettle the returning thousands, while in foreign capitals officials weighed whether an already-approved multinational force was still needed in the region.

The United Nations authorized the military force to safeguard aid distribution in Zaire on Friday, hours after the sudden, surprise return of refugees began.

"The need for humanitarian relief as I see it has not gone away," Defense Secretary William Perry said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press."

But, he said, "The nature of the need is changing dramatically by this migration of refugees from Zaire into Rwanda."

Canada, which has volunteered to lead the mission, invited military planners from participating nations to meet in Germany on Wednesday to decide how to proceed, U.S. military spokesman Maj. Brian Holt said in Berlin.

Aid agencies are now preparing for the hoped-for return of another 500,000 refugees from the region south of Zaire's Lake Kivu, said Pierce Gerety, a UNICEF coordinator for humanitarian operations.

The half-million refugees there have been cut off from aid since fighting broke out in mid-October.

The Hutus had fled Rwanda 2-1/2 years ago, fearing retribution after a Hutu-led government presided over the massacre of a half-million Tutsis.

Hutu militias in the refugee camps in Zaire held the refugees virtual prisoners until Thursday, when an attack by Zairian rebels sent the militias fleeing into the hills and the refugees hurrying home.

The Tutsi-led government that now holds power in Rwanda says it welcomes the refugees, and wants them to resume their lives at home in peace.

At least 250,000 people crossed the border Sunday, a number equal to those who have passed in the previous two days combined, UNICEF spokesman Damien Personnaz said.

Zairian Nite not only featured the culture of the country, it was also a chance for students to present their feelings on the current situation in the country.

Saturday night 90 to 100 people gathered at the International Student Center to enjoy the food and dance of Zaire.

Attendees dined on everyday food that would be served in Zaire.

Selections included rice, beans, lamb stew and chicken. One of the more exotic dishes was mfumbua, which was a dish including fiber, peanut butter and smoked fish.

Benita Bashizi, who was helping serve the food, said people eat mfumbua once a week as a natural laxative.

"Back home, we don't have laxatives and stuff. If you take it, you just go," she said.

The response to this particular dish was mixed, but many people said they enjoyed the meal.

The night also included a "Dateline NBC" TV program on the situation in Zaire. The theme of the night was "Democracy in Zaire."

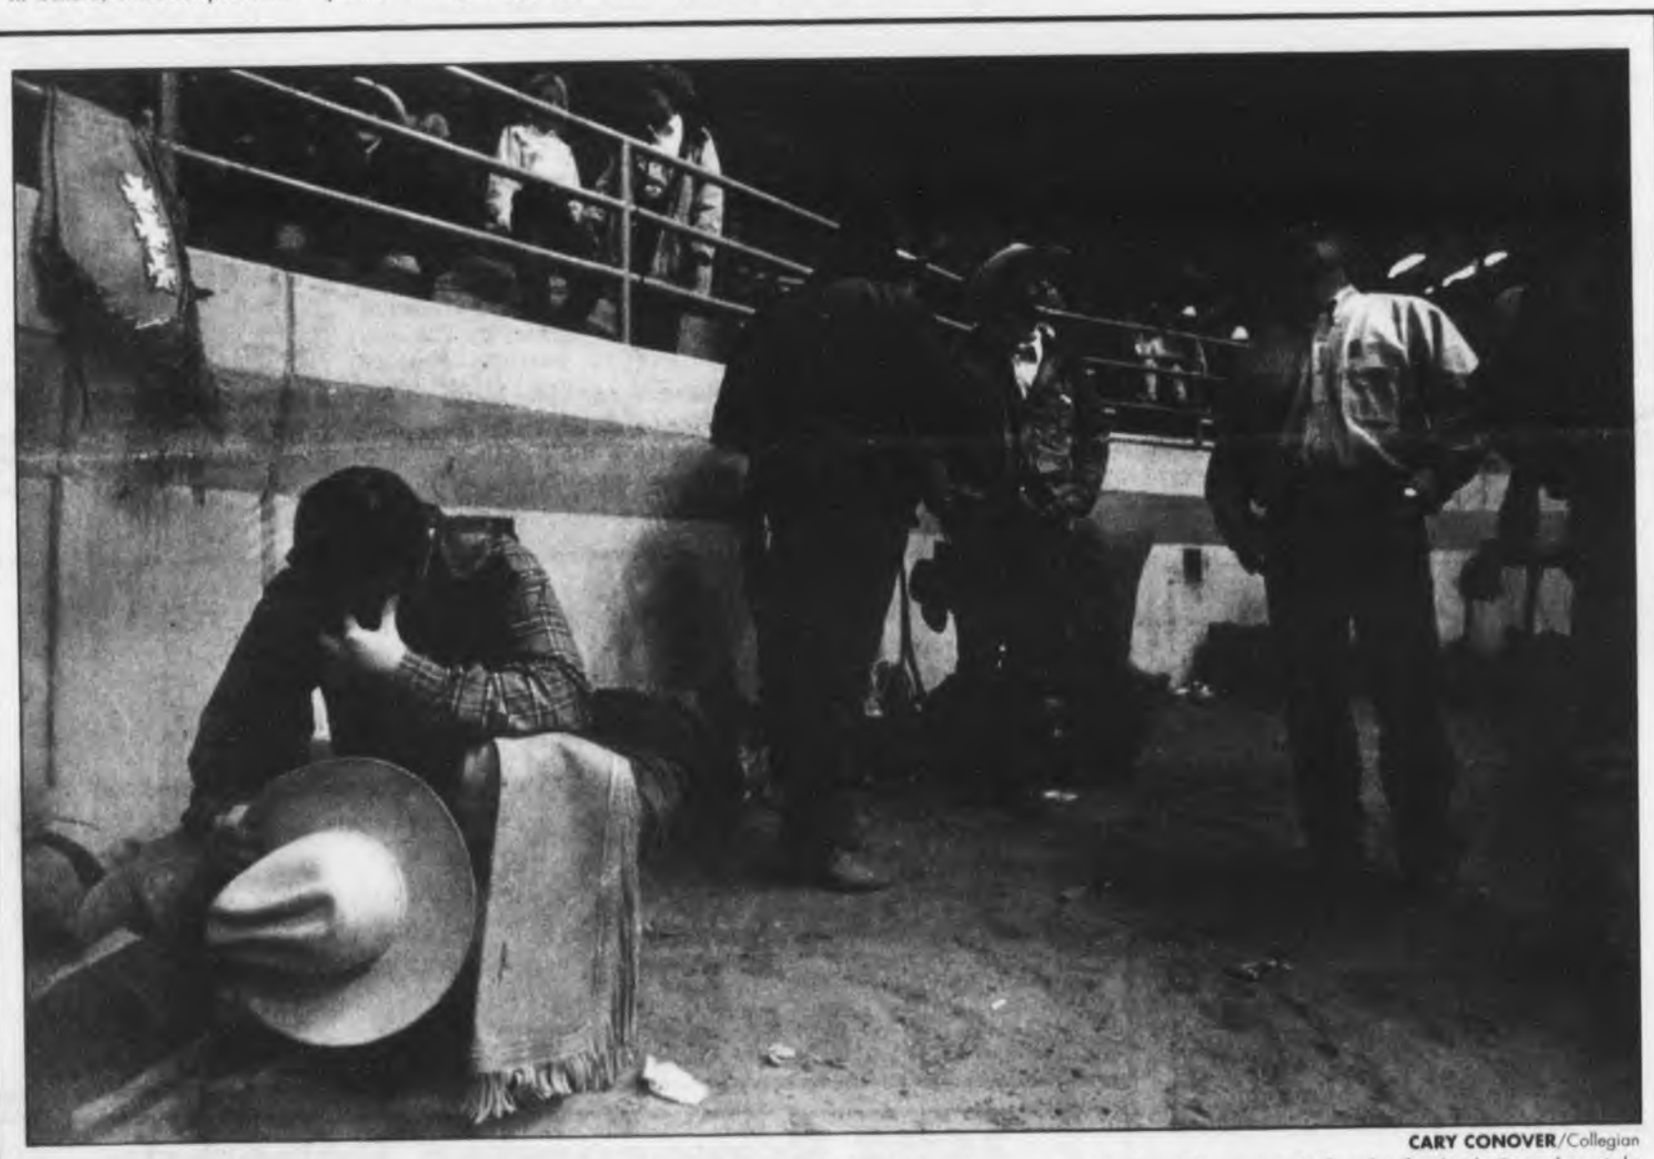
Zairian students spoke about the declining state of their country.

Colette Anderson, Manhattan resident, said there weren't enough hospitals and many children weren't getting three meals a day.

"I wish it would go back to normal," she said.

Many Zairian students blamed the situation on the current president Joseph Mobutu. They said he has stolen money, hasn't done very much to develop the country, and tortures and exiles people.

Kabasele Wa Mulumba, who is taking classes at K-State and is in the U.S. Army, said he wanted to see elections in Zaire involving two or three parties. Currently Mobutu is the only candidate.



He said although Mobutu has been out of the country to seek medical attention for prostate cancer for the past three months, people are hesitant to take his place. One person doesn't just want

Research explores food-safety issues

KARI BROWN

As the concern for food safety increases, the Kansas Agricultural Experiment Station has taken the opportunity to educate consumers about meat safety.

"Food safety has become a prominent issue for consumers and is influencing their purchasing decisions," Orlen Grunewald, professor of agricultural economics, said.

The study conducted by researchers at K-State involved a day-long study to help develop new educational materials about meat safety and how to incorporate Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Points programs into processing plants as well as households.

HACCP is a food-safety plan being implemented into many food-processing plants, Grunewald said.

The National Food Processors Association defines HACCP as preventative systems for ensuring the safe production of food.

"HACCP should be a farm-to-table strategy," Lisa Ford, graduate research assistant, said.

Participants in the workshop watched HACCP videos designed for plant employees. They were also asked to complete a willingness-to-pay survey, Ford said.

Student cowboys meet for Challenge of Champions showdown

KEITH CARTER, Hutchinson, gets bucked off his bull Saturday night at the Second Annual KSU Bullmania at Weber Arena. Carter was one of 40 participants, all coming from Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, Texas and Missouri.

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

Twenty-four of rodeo's toughest bull riders from five different associations met Friday night in Weber Arena for the Challenge of Champions showdown.

This was the first year K-State has been host to such an event, Rodeo Club coach Steve Frazier said.

Challenge of Champions was by invitation only. Each competitor had two chances to complete a ride. The cowboys tried to ride for eight seconds and obtain a score for the overall average.

Scoring of the event is based on 100 points, 50 on the rider's style and 50 on the bull's bucking ability. The points are then added together to reach a score. The combination of the two rides accounts for the average in the competition.

The idea of the Challenge of Champions and the Second Annual Bullmania came about while the Rodeo Club was searching for another fundraising activity, Frazier said.

"Our idea was to bring top-quality bull riders to Manhattan to make an exciting evening for everyone," Frazier said.

There were about 500 spectators for Friday evening's performance. Frazier said that poor attendance was the only problem the team encountered during the Challenge of Champions.

Despite the small crowd, bull-riding fans were still enthusiastic.

As cowboys made a ride or were dumped off into the arena dirt, fans still cheered.

"I always get scared when they fall off, because I think they are going to get hurt," Amy Jones, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, said.

Other spectators just enjoyed the adrenaline rush they got from watching the cowboys ride.

"My thrill is just watching them ride for eight seconds without getting hurt," Jeff Harris, spectator from Iola, said.

Many of the contestants were just as excited about the showdown as the audience was.

"There were a lot of enthusiastic bull riders and a lot of energy," Frazier said. "The bulls bucked out well, and we had some outstanding rides."

Riders from the Central Plains Rodeo Association won Friday night's team average. The teams chose a specific charity to ride for and the winners shared proceeds with their respective charity, Justin McKee, rodeo announcer, said.

This year's Challenge of Champions winner was Cauy Hudson of Goodwell, Okla. Hudson represented the Nebraska State Rodeo Association.

The Bullmania winner was Robbie Dillard, from Haysville. He won a $2,700 prize. The top placer from K-State was Justin Lynn, senior in animal science, who placed fifth.

Proceeds of the two-day event go toward scholarships for the Rodeo Club to help pay practice stock expenses and provide traveling funds, Frazier said.

Olympians lead parade, festivities

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

Today marks the kick-off for the spirit-filled Homecoming week with the theme "Big 12 Pride on the Wildcat Side." The activities start today at noon with a kick-off rally in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Spirit banners are on display in the courtyard and will be judged by several professors today.

"It's really a neat thing," Tim Riemann, Interfraternity Council vice president of external affairs, said.

They're not simply banners made out of construction paper. They're more like placards, he said.

The preliminary round of the annual body-building competition will take place at 6:30 Wednesday evening in Ahearn Field House. The competition will be a showcase of student groups' school spirit through cheers, music and athletic stunts. The final round begins at 5:30 p.m. Friday in Ahearn.

Admission to the competition will be one can of food, which will be donated to the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"That's one way we can serve the community," Riemann said.

The annual Homecoming pep rally will be between the men's and women's basketball games on Friday. During this time students will compete in the Pant the Chant contest. Participants will get one minute to show judges just how loudly and enthusiastically they can cheer for K-State.

The week will wind down on Saturday with a parade at 9 a.m. and a football game pitting Iowa State against K-State at KSU Stadium beginning at 1:10 p.m.

The grand marshals for this year's parade will be five K-Staters who were on the 1996 U.S. Olympic Team.

The Olympians include Kenny Harrison, 1988 graduate and gold-medalist in the triple jump; Mitch Richmond, also a 1988 graduate and member of the U.S. men's basketball team; Steve Fritz, 1993 graduate and fourth-place finisher in the decathlon; Connie Teaberry, 1992 graduate and member of the women's high-jump team; and Ed Broxterman, senior in mathematics education and member of the men's high-jump team.

NATION WORLD

• ROCKET TO RETURN TO EARTH. A booster rocket that Russia hoped would hurl a new space probe at Mars failed Sunday shortly after blast-off, and the stranded spacecraft threatened to come crashing down on Australia. Prime Minister John Howard went on television Monday morning to broadcast Russian and U.S. warnings that the probe would soon come down, most likely hitting northern Australia or the Timor Sea. The satellite was expected to re-enter the atmosphere at noon Monday. Australia's military was preparing for any emergency. The Russians' four-stage Proton booster lifted off as scheduled near midnight Saturday from the Baikonur Cosmodrome in Kazakstan.

• WOMAN INJURED IN MAIL-BOMB EXPLOSION. A small package that a woman had just picked up from the post office exploded when she opened it in her car Saturday, blowing out the windows and blasting her legs with shrapnel and flames. Postal Inspector Bruce Chambers declined to release the victim's name or age. The woman, who was airlifted to a hospital, was in stable condition with burns and shrapnel wounds to her legs. Chambers said the woman picked up the package around 9 a.m. at the front desk and opened it in her car, which caught fire after the explosion. He refused to say if there were any suspects.

• TEXACO CEO WANTS OTHER COMPANIES CHECKED OUT. The president of Texaco says racial discrimination problems at his company represent just the tip of the iceberg in corporate America.

Other company leaders should examine their management and workers at their companies for similar signs of racism, Peter Bijur, Texaco's president and chief executive officer, said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition.

"I would suggest that we are just seeing the tip of the iceberg here," said Bijur, whose company agreed last week to pay $176.1 million to settle a racial-discrimination lawsuit.

• RESCUERS STRUGGLE IN EGYPTIAN STORM. Battling heavy rains and murky waters, rescuers on the swollen Nile recovered six more bodies Sunday from a boat that ran aground last week, raising to 14 the number of people killed.

The Princess Jihan was carrying 128 people when it partially capsized Thursday about 300 yards off the river bank near Edfu, 360 miles south of Cairo.

Six people are still missing and feared dead. Police said the current might have swept the missing bodies away.

• ISRAEL LIFTS GAZA STRIP RESTRICTIONS. Palestinians applied for permits to enter Israel on Sunday after the Jewish state further eased restrictions that have barred thousands of Palestinians from their jobs for months. Israel announced Saturday that 15,000 more Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip would be allowed to enter. That would bring the number of Palestinians allowed to enter Israel to 50,000, about the same level as before September clashes in Palestinian areas that claimed 79 lives.

• HARASSMENT COMPLAINTS KEEP POURING IN. More than 4,000 women have telephoned an Army hotline with complaints of inappropriate sexual conduct since revelations of a sex scandal involving women recruits and their leaders at a Maryland base. Army Togo West said more than 4,000 complaints had been filed over the Army hotline. The Army intends to follow up in around 550 case. The hotline was set up after four drill sergeants and a captain at the Aberdeen Proving Ground in Maryland were charged with raping or sexually harassing at least a dozen female recruits.

CITY STATE

• STATE SENATOR GIVEN PROBATION FOR MARIJUANA. Kansas state senator Phil Martin has been given six months probation for marijuana possession after a small amount of the drug was found in his car following a traffic accident. Martin was also ordered to undergo drug and alcohol evaluations and perform 20 hours of community service work. He was sentenced Friday.

Martin, 48, was charged in February following the November 1995 traffic accident west of Lawrence in which Randy Doore of Lawrence was killed. Martin, D-Pittsburg, was found not to be at fault in the head-on collision on U.S. 40.

SPORTS

• JAYHAWKERS LOSE TO TEXAS. The Texas Longhorns (6-4, 5-2) ensured a bowl appearance with their win over fading Kansas, but their minds were on winning the South, which they can do without help from anyone else.

As the weather turned nasty in the second half, so did the Longhorns. Texas still showed its predictable vulnerability against the run, allowing Kansas star June Henley 209 yards and two touchdowns. Usually, though, they bent without breaking and allowed the offense to win it after halftime. The loss eliminates Kansas (4-6, 2-5) from bowl consideration. With just one game remaining, at Missouri, the Jayhawks will be unable to earn the six wins required for a bowl invitation.

• MIDDLEWEIGHT BOXER IN COMA. Italian boxer Fabrizio De Chiara, who collapsed in the ring during a title bout, was in a deep coma Sunday night and doctors began trying to determine if he is brain dead. The 25-year-old middleweight sustained a head injury in the fight Saturday night. De Chiara fought Vincenzo Imparato in a 12-round bout for the Italian middleweight championship Saturday night in Cancun, Mexico.

• WOMEN'S WEIGHTLIFTING. Women's weightlifting is likely to be added to the 2000 Sydney Olympics, an event in which 40 percent of the competitors are expected to be female. IOC president Juan Antonio Samaranch said Sunday more teams and disciplines in women's sports will be added while keeping to the ceiling of 10,200 athletes agreed on this week with Sydney organizers. More than 3,000 women athletes — 37 percent of the total — competed in the Atlanta Games.

Kathak dance tells stories at India Nite

Debbie Hollis
staff reporter

Storytelling through dance.

Sushmita Bannerjee, a professional Kathak dancer from India, told stories of waiting through her dance to an audience of nearly 300 people Saturday night at India Nite 96. The event was sponsored by India Student Association and was at Manhattan High School, East Campus.

Kathak, a traditional dance form of northern India, is characterized by rhythm, expression and improvisation, Bannerjee said.

Kathak is one of the oldest traditional forms of dancing in India, she said.

"It is unlike the other dance forms of India, because the dancer is allowed to experiment with rhythms like an artist can experiment with colors. That is only possible in Kathak," she said.

> "Waiting is an integral part of life. If there was not wait, life would cease to have meaning."
> • SUSHMITA BANNERJEE
> PROFESSIONAL DANCER

This freedom allows Kathak to touch on modern themes, Bannerjee said.

She chose several stories from epics and classical literature to develop her theme of waiting.

"Waiting is an integral part of life," Bannerjee said. "If there was not wait, life would cease to have meaning."

The dance was accompanied with traditional music and narrated in Hindi.

"The music speaks for itself," she said. "But the voice supports the music, so the story becomes more clear for the audience."

The stories were also outlined in the printed program.

Bannerjee told the stories through her facial expressions and body movement.

"It was almost like pantomime," Elizabeth Kearn, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Prior to Bannerjee's performance, ISA members provided a dinner of traditional Indian foods.

"It was very spicy," Kearn said, "very different from American food, but very good."

ISA will sponsor a spring function in March, Ravi Sreenivasan, ISA vice president, said. He said it will be larger in scale and feature many local performers.

Kearn said she thought cultural events such as India Nite 96 benefit all those who attend.

"It's important to expand your knowledge of other cultures and get to know other people as people, to understand what they believe and why they believe it," she said.

Planetarium shows under way

Charle Sioux Charleton
staff writer

It's another 2000 years before the Age of Aquarius actually arrives, but there is a way to get a look at the night skies in advance. Through the efforts of members of the physics club, the K-State planetarium is up and running.

"With the star projector, we can pick a point in the future and show you what the skies over Manhattan will look like," Jennifer Smith, sophomore in physics, said. "Who knows when it's really the Age of Aquarius. Two thousand years is just a blink in cosmological time."

The group plans monthly shows, with the first presented Sept. 26. Saturday night, they presented a program titled "The Myths of Perseus and Andromeda."

Before the physics club members took over, the planetarium sat empty from 1993 until recently. It was well-used from 1963 to 1993, Lloyd Verhage, a network administrator at Justin Hall, said.

"Mostly we had to figure things out for ourselves. We replaced a lot of light bulbs — a lot of them — and made some repairs," Verhage said.

One problem the group faced was getting the console that runs the star projector in working order. By use of controls on the console, stars can brighten, satellites appear, and the latitude of the equator can change, making it possible to see the skies over both the North and South poles.

With the flip of a switch, lightning bolts, eclipses and the aurora borealis appear and disappear. Slide projectors set around the perimeter show pictures of planets, stars and galaxies. Slides can be projected over constellations, showing the picture formed by the stars.

"There was no book to run the console, so I got on e-mail. It's no longer published, but we finally got one sent to us, so we photocopied it," Verhage said.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

JENNIFER SMITH, sophomore in physics, and Joseph Pingenot, freshman in physics and computer engineering, talk about different features of the Spitz A3P star projector Saturday night at the K-State planetarium.

Stepping into the planetarium, on the fourth floor of Cardwell Hall, is like stepping into another world. There are two rows of black leather benches, with high backs and extra padding for craned necks. The floor is covered with bright blue carpeting, and posters of the cosmos decorate the walls.

The next show, scheduled for Dec. 14, covers clusters of stars. Verhage said the star clusters visible at that time include Pleaides, Hyades, the Alpha Persii moving group and the Ursa Major moving group.

When school resumes, February's program will focus on the Zodiacal Constellations and March brings another lunar eclipse so people can have a look at that.

"Unless we get clouds that night," Verhage said. "We had clouds the first time and rain tonight. Even if we can't look through the telescope, we can enjoy the planetarium."

Lecture series brings U.N. adviser to K-State campus

Charle Sioux Charleton

Edward Luck, a senior policy adviser for the U.N. Association, will speak at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in Union Forum Hall.

His lecture, part of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series, is titled "The U.S. and the U.N.: the Odd Couple in the Age of Uncertainty."

"Edward Luck will be on campus most of the day, and he will present a forum in the Big 12 Room at 3 p.m.," John Fliter, assistant professor of political science and Lou Douglas Lecture Committee member, said. "The title of the forum is 'One World Government: To Be or Not To Be?'"

Vickie Choitz, the coordinator for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series, said the Flint Hills chapter of the U.N. Association will be host to the forum and a reception afterward in the Cats' Pause Lounge in the K- State Student Union.

Rosalys Rieger, past president of the Flint Hills chapter of the U.N. Association, said Luck is a particularly dynamic, inspiring and motivating speaker.

"He will definitely be in support of the U.N. but not necessarily in support of U.S. policy. He is candid regarding the relationship between the U.S. and the U.N.," she said.

Rieger said Luck will inform people about how they can support the United States and the United Nations. Although Luck supports the United Nations, he is not a rubber stamp of approval for it and does not always endorse U.N. policies, she said.

"I think students as well as community members will thoroughly enjoy hearing him speak and will be inspired by him," said Rieger, current secretary and legislative chair for the chapter.

William Richter, associate provost for international programs, said the Lou Douglas Lecture Series has brought a lot of speakers to campus to enlighten students about a wide range of topics on campus.

"It is important to note there is a lot of misunderstanding in the U.S. about the U.N. There are groups specifically out to attack the U.N. and the United States' role in the U.N.," he said. "It is valuable to K-State to have a speaker of Edward Luck's stature."

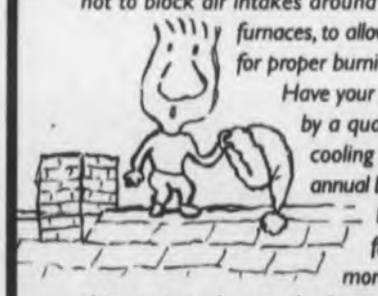
Six ways to make your life a little easier, and your home a whole lot safer.

Natural gas is a safe, efficient fuel – if you'll keep these simple suggestions in mind.



Follow your nose.
In its natural state, the gas that fuels your home is odorless. So KPL adds mecaptan – a substance that smells, well, like rotten eggs.

If you smell gas, get out. Don't strike a match, flip a light switch, turn on a flashlight, or even use your phone. Any of these can create a spark. Gather your family and pets and call us from a neighbor's phone. Dial 1-800-794-4780, and we'll be there to check it out.

Inspect for perfection.
Make regular visual inspections of gas appliances to make sure the burner flame is burning blue. A yellow flame indicates the fuel is not burning properly. Be sure not to block air intakes around appliances such as furnaces, to allow ample oxygen flow for proper burning.

Have your gas furnace checked by a qualified heating and cooling contractor on an annual basis. Clean or replace heating system air filters at least once a month. Check flues and chimney to make sure they're venting properly.

Be informed about carbon monoxide.
Carbon monoxide is odorless - yet it can be quite hazardous. Headache, dizziness, fatigue, excessive perspiration, and nausea are some of the many symptoms of poisoning from unburned fuel. If you suspect carbon monoxide poisoning, leave the building. Phone 911, the number of your local emergency response organization (fire or police department) or KPL at 1-800-794-4780, from another location.

If considering a carbon monoxide detector to help alert your family, look for a detector that meets these minimum standards – emits an audible alarm, is Underwriters Lab Approved and bears the AGA Blue Star Certificate seal. Be sure to follow the manufacturer's instructions for use and placement.

Teach your family well.
Let your children know what you're doing to make your home safe. Teach them the signs of possible gas leaks and carbon monoxide poisoning, and what they should do if they suspect either. Make sure they follow these other common sense, safety tips:
- Don't use a gas range or unvented space heater as a heating source in your home.
- Make sure the garage door is open before starting automobiles.
- Always start lawn mowers and snow blowers outside your garage.
- Never grill inside an enclosed porch or garage.

Look for us looking out for you.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Committee needed to find homes for K-State's lost art

We learn in school the key to success is good communication.

It is this quality that is lacking on this campus when it comes to cultural heritage, the loose definition of which is the K-State Art Collection.

Since the opening of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art in October, many of the finer pieces of the K-State Art Collection have been gathered and either exhibited in its galleries or stored in its facilities.

WHY WE CARE

Internationally known art with a K-State connection is not being displayed, because it does not fit in traditional art

While most of the collection was easy to catalog, there are pieces of art that either did not fit the museum's definition of art or aren't considered part of the collection, depending on how it was acquired.

The best example of the confusion caused by this new situation is the work of Mitsugi Ohno, K-State's former master glass-blower and an internationally renowned glass artist.

Ohno's work is in the Japanese Imperial Palace and the Smithsonian Institution. However, the majority of his work belongs to the University but is spread out among campus buildings.

Ohno has said he has given his work to the art museum. The Department of Chemistry, which oversees some of his work, also maintains at least three sculptures belong to the art museum. But the art-museum staff has said the work is not part of the collection.

So where does the art belong? And if it doesn't belong in the museum, could there be an alternative space on campus for all of Ohno's work to be exhibited in an appropriate and convenient setting?

If K-State wants to preserve its artistic legacy, ranging in diversity from many student and faculty works to numerous oddities, action must be taken soon to coordinate the preservation and proper exhibition of the collection.

The art museum may not possess the resources necessary to care for all art on campus. The University should find a way to care for its alternative art.

The creation of a committee of art-department faculty, art-museum staff, administrators and other relevant individuals to begin discussions to reach proactive decisions concerning this art would be a good starting point.

If anything, this committee would get people communicating. If action isn't taken soon, you'll continue to hear a different story from each party. And meanwhile, the rest of the K-State Art Collection will collect dust, either unseen or unappreciated by the public.

PERSONALITY DIFFERENCES

MY

Roopa
SWAMINATHAN

Ever meet those always-smiling, always-happy people?

The ones who have a positive attitude about everything. They believe the world is the coolest and hippest place to live. They are everywhere. Kids with a gung-ho attitude to life and all its problems. They take each day as it comes.

No thought about the past or future. The present, the now, is all that matters. They have no solutions to any of the problems in the world. They honestly believe there are no problems to begin with. They call themselves idealists.

Others are just a trifle rude. They call them lazy, uncommitted.

Then there are others, ambitious to the point that it scares others sometimes. Those who acknowledge all people don't have it equal. But they will face all the problems life throws them. If they can't beat 'em, they sure as hell will join 'em.

They don't wait for the system to change. They simply make the system change for them. They use the system and its very rules and make it work for them. They call themselves pragmatists. Realists. Leaders, even.

Others are just a trifle rude. They call them vultures, parasites, leeches, cunning, immoral. And of course, ambitious.

Somehow ambitious people are mostly looked upon with suspicion unless they are looked at by other ambitious people. Then they are viewed with respect, even awe. But others look at ambitious people and pretty much decide they are a conniving bunch of people who lie and twist the truth to get ahead in life. In short, they leave no stone unturned in their quest for success.

I remember a story I heard back in India. It happened a very long time back.

A man fresh out of college was looking out for a job in advertising. He was called for a job interview, and the first question his potential employer asked him was "Are you a very moralistic person?"

Our friend wanted to say yes really bad, because that would be a truthful answer, except he realized straight off that there was a big catch here. Such a question would never have been asked if the required answer was a simple yes. He lied. He said no.

And got the job.

On the first day of his job, his boss told him, "Leave your code of moralities and ethics back home. In advertising, there are no ethics."

And his first campaign gave him no reason to dispute that statement.

His agency got a call from a liquor company. (Now, liquor advertising in India is not allowed in the mass media. No television, no radio, no press. The only way a corporate liquor company can advertise is through sponsorship of events.)

The product brief said the advertising firm had to come up with an advertising campaign for a new brand of whisky, which in turn the company very adamantly wanted to promote through the mass media.

Problem.

Big client, very big money and rules that could not be broken. His boss and some others along with our friend brainstormed ways of trying to get through the loopholes and clinch the campaign.

They finally came up with an idea.

They told their clients to come up with a new product — distilled water in this case. Asked them to package the product in a bottle that would be very similar to that of the whisky.

This product would be available only in select markets — a fact that was not publicized — and went on a Blitzkrieg in the mass media. By association, people understood the ad was for liquor, but the advertising company did not break the law in any way.

The clients were happy. The agency was thrilled. It was our friend's idea, and he got promoted.

My friend later admitted he had a tough time sleeping for a while after that. Legally, they were on the right, but were they ethically and morally right? It was not easy for him to let go of his first job in a cut-throat and competitive field.

He found it tough to rebel on his first campaign. He also had a future and his family to think of. A career was on the make here, not to mention what the promotion did to his monetary status.

Some friends told him he was unnecessarily justifying his actions. The simple truth was he was ambitious.

The guy was one of my clients in India. Today he is a successful man in advertising and a person I really look up to. I see in him a committed go-getter and also a wonderful human being. Though he is envied and admired by many, there are others who call him conniving, someone who would stop at nothing to get ahead in life.

He always maintained that success, morality and ethics don't quite go hand-in-hand in this world. That was not the voice of a cynic speaking. It was simply the voice of one who was realistic enough to say it — because he had been there and, yeah, he had done it all, too.

Why is there such a resistance to ambitious people — to people with definite opinions? Why are they almost always considered troublemakers? Why aren't they ever allowed to be ambitious and idealists at the same time? And I use the word allow because it simply is not a decision they can make of their free will.

And if they choose to be ambitious, why are they branded villains?

And then there is the other side to the story.

For the other side of this story, read Roopa's column next week.

DYSFUNCTIONAL FAMILY MATTERS

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

MY

Mary Renee
SMITH

"There were day-long fights that felt more like re-enactments of the Spanish Inquisition. He would accuse the four of us of conspiring together against him by hiding the remote control. After a while, we really were."

My family puts the fun in dysfunctional. We are the kind of thing talk shows are made of. I wouldn't trade them for the world.

I don't want anyone to think I'm whining or looking for sympathy or therapy. I'm very thankful for the crap I have gone through. I love my family. They just aren't exactly typical.

Just last weekend we sat around the table and talked about my brother's drug habit. He has been clean for a month or so, but for a while he was apparently competing for stoner of the year — and winning.

I laughed so hard I almost wet myself.

My mother, brother, boyfriend and I sat around the dinner table and listened to tales of Michael putting 'shrooms inside Fudge Rounds, cheeseburgers and even blueberry milkshakes. He'll never be able to eat another Little Debbie snack as long as he lives.

Mom chimed in and began to reminisce about her days of ice-water bongs and Jimmy Carter roach clips. She and my brother compared the price of marijuana then and now.

The conversation didn't seem that unusual to me. I realized long ago my family isn't what politicians and preachers have in mind when they speak of family values.

Growing up, I thought everyone's family had problems. I was right. No family is perfect, but most aren't as fucked up as mine. Excuse my use of a four-letter word, but there is really no other way to describe my home life.

My stepdad wouldn't come home for days, and no one would care. We had to rearrange furniture and the pictures on the walls before company came over to hide the gaping holes in the walls where he had taken out his frustrations.

There were day-long fights that felt more like re-enactments of the Spanish Inquisition. He would accuse the four of us of conspiring together against him by hiding the remote control. After a while, we really were.

This man's favorite game when we were little was "You're uglier than me."

It went a little like this: He would say, "You're ugly." Our reply was "No, you're ugly." Then he would say "Nope, you're uglier than me."

Neato self-esteem-building family game, huh? So much for Monopoly or Connect Four.

That's just some of the nicer stuff he did. The not-so-nice stuff decency laws prevent me from putting into print.

He's finally gone. Good riddance to bad rubbish. You can't erase 20 years of nights of screaming threats and the police knocking at the front door. We are doing the best we can to make things conventional for a change.

Like I said before, I wouldn't trade my family for anyone else's. I am not the only person in the world who has survived a less-than-perfect life.

Look at all the famous people who have risen out of completely screwed-up families. Madonna, Oprah and Cher all come from less-than-perfect households. (There seems to be a correlation between being from a dysfunctional family and using only one name. I overcompensate by using three names.)

What I have in common with these famous survivors is I am thankful for everything my family has taught me. But I think I could have done without the lessons in ducking under flying objects.

Because of my upbringing, I handle stress and moments of crisis exceptionally well. The capacity to go on with life as usual despite the chaos at home was a must.

In my family we had to have the ability to play happy family, to pretend everything at home was hunky-dory. Holidays, school functions and family reunions brought Oscar-winning performances from myself and my siblings.

My sense of humor comes from my experiences at home. I have a tendency to see humor in even the most depressing situations. It is an ability that has kept me and people around me from the brink of insanity more than once.

I am most thankful for that. Humor is a powerful tool.

There are times in life you have only two responses to choose from — to laugh or to cry. It's not acceptable to cry in public, so we all laugh.

In my family we laugh loud and often.

As the holidays approach, be thankful for the family you have. Even the Cleavers, Bradys and Cosbys had problems. Appreciate all you have learned and who you have become.

Most of all, laugh loud and often.

STEPPING OUT

Wherever step came from, it made a little money for philanthropy at Neak Frasty

Story by Kelly Kiefer Photos by Clif Palmberg

The challenge of a step routine, which involves choreographed clapping, stomping and chanting, was met by talented, energetic participants at the sixth-annual Neak Frasty Alpha Phi Alpha Step Show.

Members of six fraternities and one sorority stepped in the show Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Groups traveled from Iowa, Missouri and Oklahoma to compete.

Their 10-minute step routines were judged on several categories, including syncopation, showmanship and audience appeal.

Marche Fleming-Randle, K-State graduate and Alpha Kappa Alpha alumna, was one of the judges at the show. She said judges look for several different things in a step routine.

"You're looking for transition, how they move from one point to another," Fleming-Randle said. "You look at the style and grace."

Men are also judged on their physique, sharpness and expertise, she said.

Fleming-Randle said the groups take pride in stepping, and it is something representative of fraternities and sororities.

Nate Scott, senior in advertising and president of Alpha Phi Alpha, said members of the historically black greek organizations use stepping for distinguishing features, diversity, unity and entertainment.

Step originated in the United States with the first black fraternities. Alpha Phi Alpha was the first, founded in 1906. Women started stepping 15-20 years ago, Fleming-Randle said.

She said many of the steps come from African movements.

Scott said there are different ideas about where step began. He believes that stepping evolved from military life.

"It is associated to what drill teams do, but step is more complicated," Scott said.

Not only are step routines choreographed, they often use theatrical scenes and three-line syncopation. A step team might divide into three lines, each stepping a different beat. Together, the rhythm of the beats is syncopated.

Scott said each fraternity or sorority has some aspect of step that is representative of its organization. For example, the men of Kappa Alpha Psi use canes in their step routines.

Kappa Alpha Psis who competed in Neak Frasty were from Iowa State University. They twirled canes, tossed them in the air to one another, tapped them on the floor and tapped them together.

Scott said Omega Psi Phis are known for stepping hard.

The men of Alpha Phi Alpha are recognized for their precision and creativity. The Alpha Phi Alphas from Lincoln University created a 1970s atmosphere with an introduction to "At the Car Wash" wearing Afros.

Originality was key to the introductions and conclusions of several routines. Music was used for some transitions and to enter and exit the stage.

The Alpha Kappa Alphas introduction was about sophistication, with two women walking out in suits during a voice-over about the organization.

"We're known for our pink and green, being prissy, pretty and sophisticated with grace and style," Korri Hall, junior in electrical engineering, said.

Participants stepped in the show primarily because they wanted to step, but a first-place prize of $1,000 would help groups with their philanthropies, Scott said.

"They're in the show to win money, so they can do all of their philanthropies," he said. "A thousand dollars can go a long way for a philanthropy."

The Alpha Phi Alpha-Beta Lambda chapter, an alumni chapter from Kansas City, won the men's competition.

The Alpha Phi Alpha chapter from Oklahoma State University took second place, winning a $500 prize.

The Alpha Kappa Alpha women of K-State stepped uncontested and were awarded the $1,000 prize. Hall said the sorority has not decided what it will do with the money yet.

The step show is Alpha Phi Alpha's largest philanthropy. The proceeds from the show will benefit the group's other philanthropies, which are centered around youth.

"We plan to go into high schools with the Upward Bound program and pay for seniors to take their ACTs. After they take their ACTs, some of them will have their books paid for for school," Scott said.

Proceeds will also fund the Thurgood Marshall Scholarship Fund.

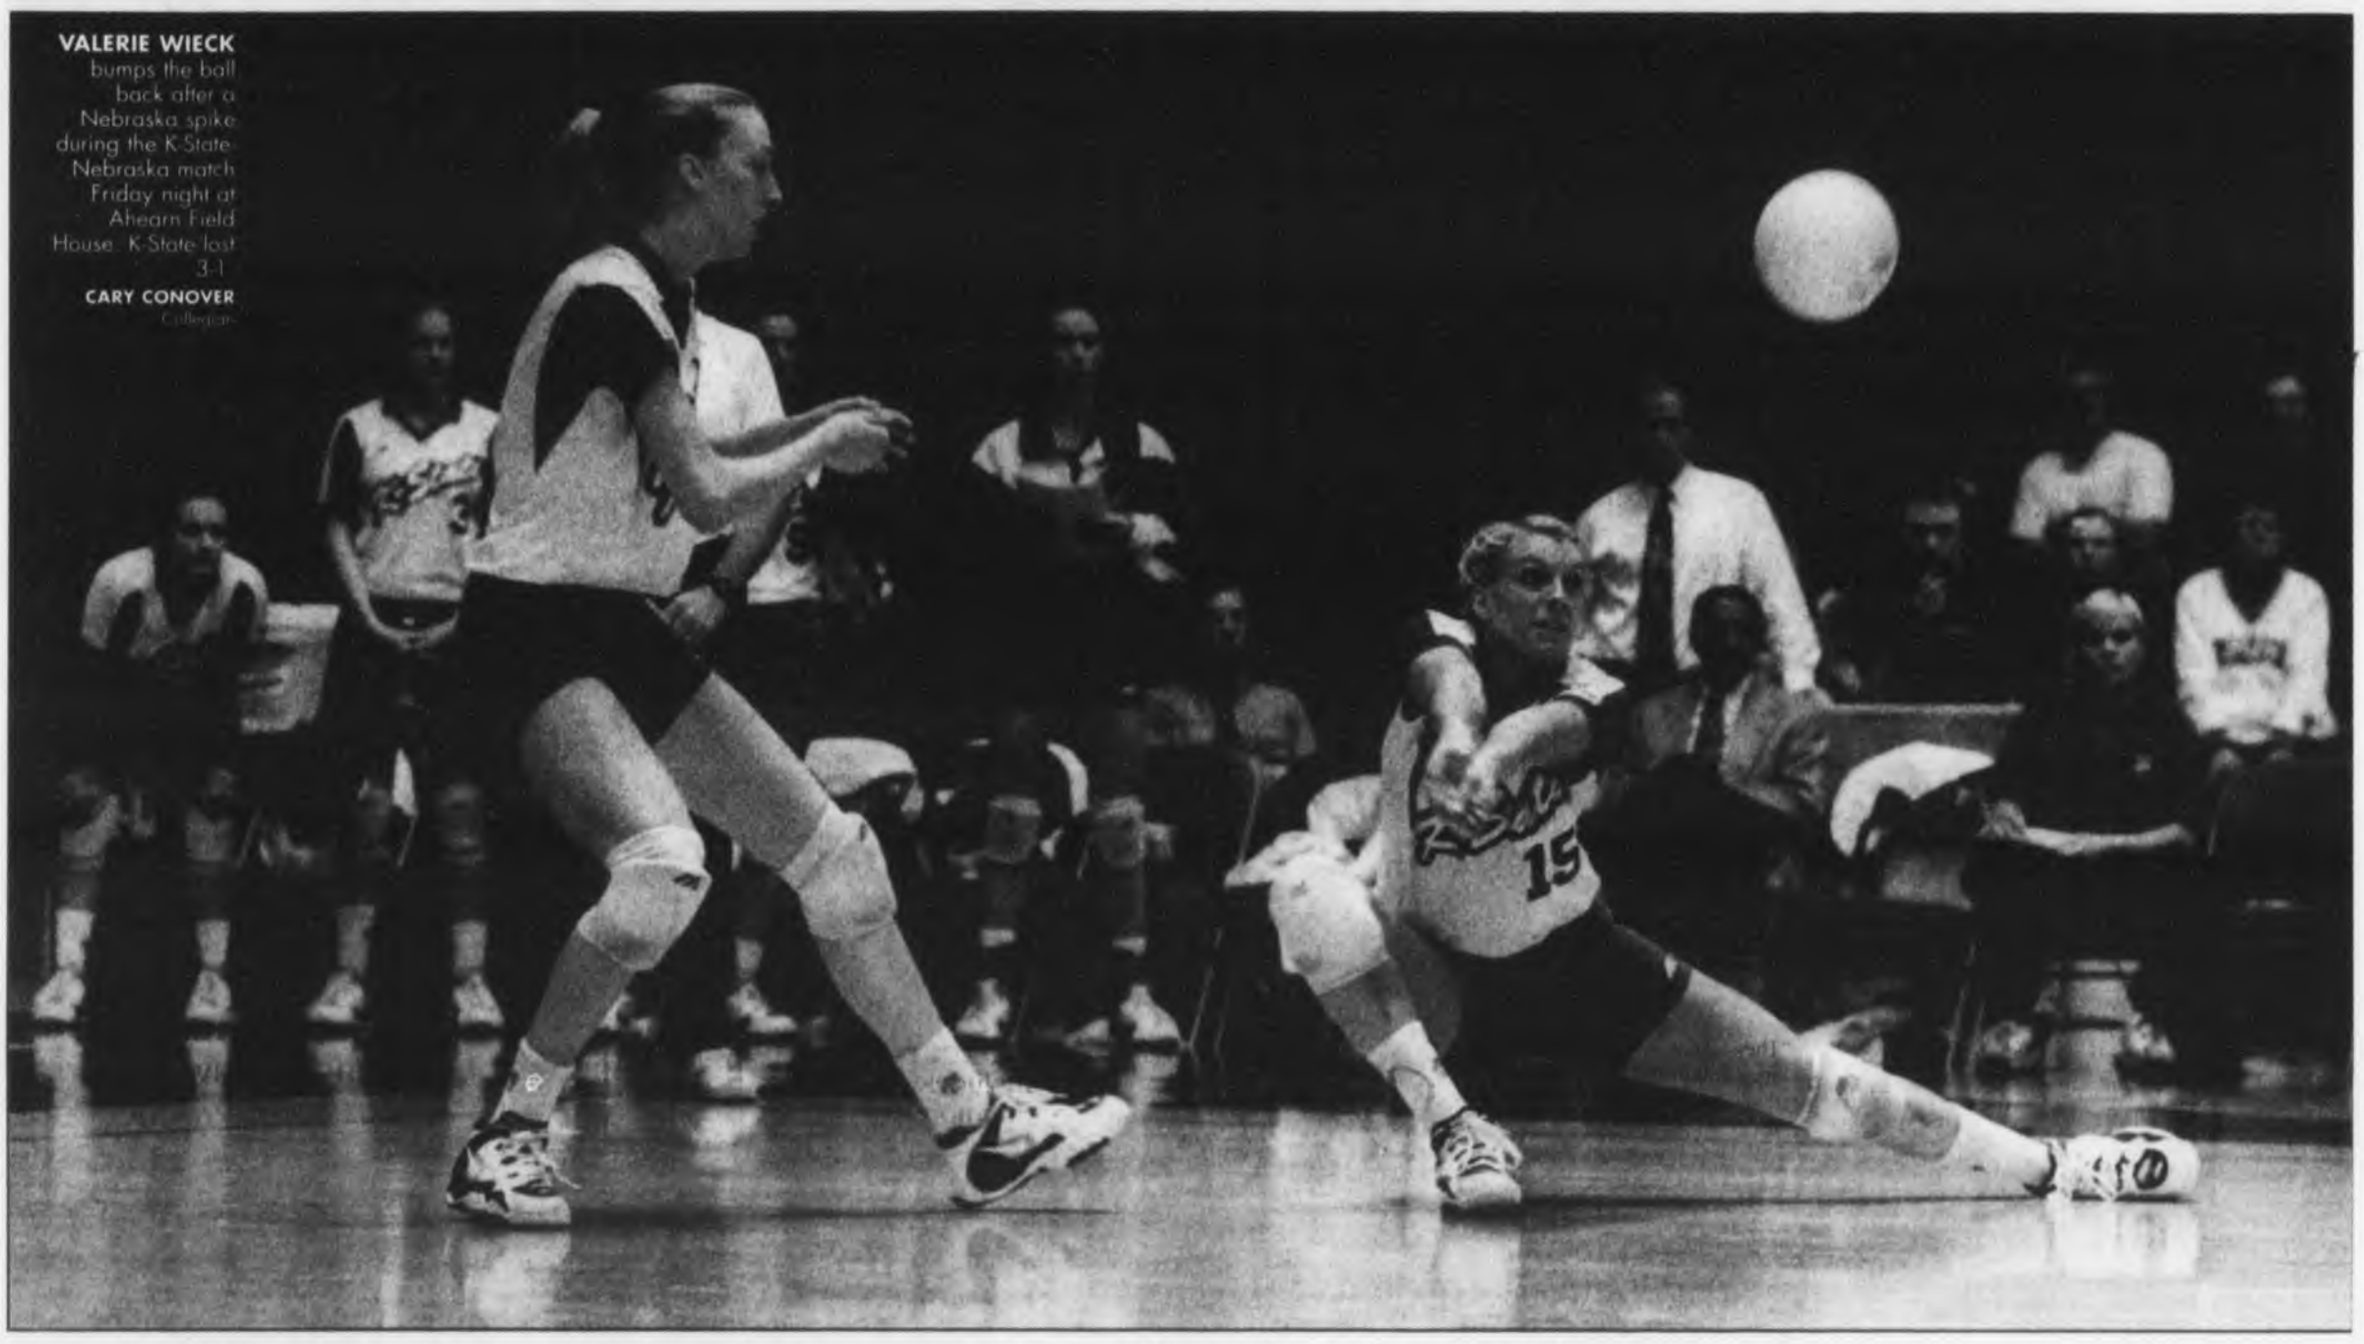
"We'll be able to pay for one or two students' tuition for either a semester or if their parents came up with $500, we will meet them with $500. Or we will pay for 12 credits, something like that," Scott said.

The focus of Alpha Phi Alpha's philanthropies is on helping students go to college.

"There are a lot of students that don't have the money to go to school, or they might not have the will power, or they just need a little push. That's what we're concerned with," Scott said.

ROB PRICE, Southwestern Phi Beta Sigma, steps Friday night in the competition.

GREG LEWIS swings his cane as a part of the Kappa Alpha Psi skit. Lewis and the competing Kappa Alpha Psi group are from Iowa State University.words of the cutline are Futura bold all caps.



BILLY WILLIAMS opens the evening up by emceeing the event. Williams, a K-State Alpha Phi Alpha, spent about 20 minutes before the show entertaining the crowd of spectators.

The K-State Wildcats battled the Colorado Buffaloes at Folsom Field in Boulder Saturday night in a game with far-reaching implications.

With a win the Wildcats would have been almost assured of their first-ever Bowl Alliance bid and a New Year's Day game.

But Colorado defeated K-State 12-0.

On K-State's first drive, Brian Kavanagh was sacked by defensive tackle Ryan Olson for a loss of seven yards. On the next play, Kavanagh scrambled for a yard and put the Cats in fourth-and-19 situation deep in their own territory, and they were forced to punt.

"We were on an emotional high," cornerback Chris Canty said. "But we just didn't react well."

Colorado's first drive was a quick and successful one, as the Buffaloes took just four minutes to drive 63 yards and score a touchdown on a 27-yard run by Herchell Troutman.

The Buffaloes, however, only put six points on the board as the extra point attempt sailed wide right.

Coming into the game, the Wildcats were No. 1 in the Big 12 in pass defense, and the Buffaloes were No. 1 in pass offense.

"Colorado throws a lot," Smith said. "They wanted to come in and balance the attack, probably because of the weather."

Without much offensive production in the first half because of the blistering Buffalo defense, the K-State defense had to put up a fight against the malicious Colorado offense.

"They have a high-power offense and the best quarterback in the conference," Canty said. "We came out and did some good things."

Rae Carruth, the league's leading receiver, had two consecutive 100-yard receiving games coming into the contest with the Cats. However, Wildcat defensive backs held the Buffalo sensation to just 36 yards on five receptions.

"Our pass protection was real good," center Jason Johnson said. "Our backside safeties made a lot of big plays."

Snyder said he felt the defense did a wonderful job.

"I thought we played extremely well on defense. To hold a very potent offense to six points was an excellent effort," Snyder said. "I thought we did a good job against the pass. We did a very good job against the run, and the kids played hard throughout."

With 6:23 left in the second quarter, the Cats took possession on their own 30-yard line after a four-yard punt return by Canty.

Driving in a light drizzle of snow, the Cats looked to put some points on the board before the half.

After a seven-yard completion to Mike Lawrence, Kavanagh was picked off by cornerback Damen Wheeler, which accounted for one of his two interceptions on the night. Wheeler returned the catch for 26 yards to the K-State 14-yard line.

The Buffaloes then drove 14 yards in 55 seconds and recorded their second touchdown of the game. Colorado sought a two-point conversion, but Koy Detmer's pass was broken up by Canty, and the Buffaloes led 12-0 at halftime.

The K-State offense struggled in the first half as it mounted up only 51 total yards.

The highlight of the first half had to be when wide receiver Kevin Lockett broke Hart Lee Dykes' Big 8 record of 203 career receptions. Lockett rewrote the record books in the second quarter when he snatched a 6-yard pass from Kavanagh and caught his 204th pass of his collegiate career.

The Cats came out in the second half and manhandled the Buffs on an ensuing drive, which looked as if they would score a touchdown.

Starting at its own 8, K-State pushed its way up the field behind 49 yards of rushing during the drive from Lawrence.

The Cats had the ball for 8:29 and Volleyball team falls in weekend match-ups

JOHN BERGGREN

The K-State volleyball team endured one of its toughest weekends this season losing to Nebraska and Colorado, both in four games.

Friday night against Nebraska, a record crowd of 4,958 packed into Ahearn Field House to watch what was billed as one of the biggest matches in K-State volleyball history.

The Cats played every match tough, losing the first two 15-12, winning the third 15-7, but losing the fourth 15-12. With the loss K-State fell to 0-54 lifetime against Nebraska.

In the first match K-State battled back from a six-point deficit to tie the game at nine. Nebraska wouldn't give in and scored the next five points, giving its team a 14-9 advantage.

On game point the Wildcats turned it up a notch and fought back to make the score 12-14. Yet after a side-out Nebraska clinched the game 15-12.

In the second game the Cats let a 12-7 lead dwindle away to an eventual 15-12 loss. After the intermission K-State came out and owned the third game.

"I thought at that point we were going to get on a roll and get back into the match," K-State coach Jim Moore said. "Somehow it didn't work out that way."

The Cats were able to build a 10-4 lead in the fourth game, but again the Huskers would not give in. Nebraska scored two straight points and then gave up one to make it 11-6 K-State. Then Nebraska went on a rampage, scoring eight unmatched points, and eventually pulled out a 15-12 win.

Freshman outside hitter Abbie Brown, a native Nebraskan, said the loss to Nebraska really hurt the team.

"We really thought we could win," Brown said. "We have four players from Nebraska on the team, and we couldn't win it. We had a lot of let-downs. We showed obviously we can play with them. We just had too many mental lapses."

On paper K-State beat Nebraska in hitting percentage, out-hitting the Huskers .251 to .233. Sophomore swing hitter Kim Zschau led K-State with 26 kills followed by Brown with 23.

The Nebraska loss carried into the next night's match-up against Colorado. K-State lost to the Buffaloes again in four games, 16-14, 13-15, 15-3, 15-7.

K-State only hit .190 compared to Colorado's .254, and Kate DeClerk led the team in kills with 16. Brown had a career high in total attacks with 59, but hit a negative .034.

After winning the second game, Moore said he thought his team was going to get back on track.

Lockett breaks yet another long-standing record

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

Senior wide receiver Kevin Lockett will long be remembered as the all-time career receptions leader in Big 12 history.

In Saturday's game, Lockett broke the Big 8 record of 203 career receptions set by Hart Lee Dykes at Oklahoma State, as he caught seven passes.

"It honestly doesn't mean a thing right now. It's something I look back on when I'm done playing here," Lockett said. "Right now, it's not even crossing my mind." Lockett, K-State's career receiving leader, needs 204 receiving yards next week against Iowa State to surpass Dykes for the Big 8 career lead in receiving yards.

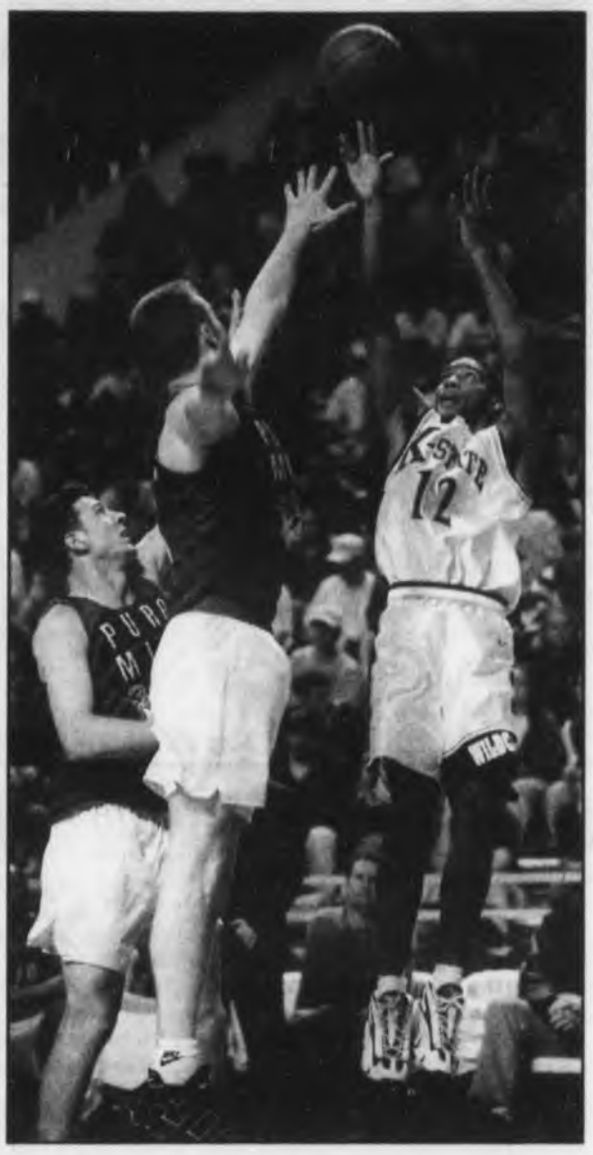
Lockett

No players in Big 8 history had more receptions or yardage at the end of their junior season.

"A lot of their plan was to take Kevin Lockett away, and he still made plays," quarterback Brian Kavanagh said.

"He's now set a record that will never be broke, and Kevin deserves it," he said.

Lockett, a 1996 Biletnikoff and all-America candidate, is one of the premiere receivers in the nation.



"Having him out there is always a great comfort," Kavanagh said.

"There's a couple of times he was going to the post, and with most receivers you don't throw the pass, but with Kevin you just think he's going to get it," he said. "Even in a tight spot, you've got to give him a chance."

Lockett ranks 14th nationally and first in the Big 12 in receptions per game with 6.33 and ranks 25th nationally in reception yardage per game at 85.22.

"It's unfortunate," Kavanagh said. "It would have been nice if we could have won this game and then had this to celebrate also."

Lockett is just the 17th player in NCAA history to catch 200 passes.

The K-State basketball team exited exhibition play with an even record after a 74-62 loss to the Adelaide 36ers Friday night.

Although the Cats were beaten soundly by their preseason foe, head coach Tom Asbury said he thought bringing in quality competition allowed the team to practice and learn many things they couldn't against weaker exhibition teams.

"If we had just brought in a team we could smash into the floor, we wouldn't have been able to accomplish what we wanted," Asbury said. "By bringing in a well-coached, good, experienced team that challenges our game, I think it will help us."

> • GERALD EAKER
> SENIOR CENTER

Trailing by 16 points at halftime, the Cats fell behind by as much as 26 before fighting back for a 12-point loss. The 36ers' nine three-pointers helped bury the Cats, who were plagued by 38-percent shooting from the field and 50 percent at the charity stripe.

"You kind of shoot yourself in the foot when you can't convert the bonuses," Asbury said.

Freshman forward Pero Vasiljevic led K-State with 11 points, and senior center Gerald Eaker came up big defensively by nabbing seven rebounds and blocking four shots. For Vasiljevic, who is from Adelaide, Australia, the exhibition had more at stake than just defeat.

"I knew all the guys and practiced with the team over the summer," Vasiljevic said. "(The loss) will always be in the back of my mind."

While the Cats were able to place the 36ers in foul trouble early on, lack of execution on the offensive and defensive end left the door open for Adelaide, which capitalized from the outside early and inside late in the contest.

With one week to prepare for the Nov. 22 season opener at home against the University of Missouri-Kansas City, Asbury said the team still had much to work on and run through. However, when asked about the significance of the defeat, one player said he thought it would not continue into the season.

"It was a tough defeat, but we'll forget about it," Eaker said. "I think we'll start out the season like we ended tonight."

Shooting problems lead to defeat, 78-64

The Wildcats played their lone preseason tune-up Sunday, dropping a 78-64 decision to Uralmash, a club team from Russia.

The Wildcats led much of the first half, with senior guard Missy Decker knocking down a three-pointer from the left wing for the game's first basket. K-State extended its lead to eight points, 31-23, when senior forward Andria Jones completed a three-point play with 4:24 remaining in the half.

> "I liked our first half on both ends of the floor. But again, it's upon us to put 40 minutes together.
> • DEB PATTERSON
> WOMEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

"I think we opened the game executing well and had good, strong defensive stands," Coach Deb Patterson said.

But that execution fell off at the end of the period. Uralmash began to trap the Wildcats, who play without a true point guard, helping the Russian club go on a 16-4 run to close the half. Uralmash led 39-35 at the break.

"We had some crucial turnovers at the end of the first half, and they took advantage of that," Decker said.

While the Cats cut down on the turnovers in the second half, they had trouble getting their shots to fall, connecting on just 10 of 28 attempts. Uralmash took advantage, with 11 second-half points from Olympian Elena Pshikova leading the way.

"They shoot so quick," Jones said of the Russian team. "It seemed like every time I turned around, No. 4 (Pshikova) was shooting over me."

The Cats came within five points twice in the second half, but were unable to close the gap.

"I liked our first half on both ends of the floor," Patterson said. "But again, it's upon us to put 40 minutes together."

K-State's second exhibition game was scheduled for midway through the season, a Dec. 21 match-up with the St. Louis Lady Express.

That means K-State's next stop on the hard court will be Friday's season opener against Memphis in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Tigers, favored to win Conference USA after losing just one starter from last year's NCAA Tournament team, have a big, physical front line and like to push the ball up the court.

"We've got to learn to handle the pressure by then," Decker said.

Plan could make college living more enjoyable

Beth Husted
staff writer

College students across the nation have heard the horror stories about it. They have lived their pre-freshman days in fear of it.

Life in the residence halls.

But never fear students of K-State. The Department of Housing and Dining Services has been trying to put together a plan to make living in the residence halls a much more pleasurable experience.

It's called the Partnership for the Future. And for residence-hall dwellers at K-State, it's a welcomed plan for improvement.

Improvements for housing and dining facilities at K-State have already started with housing.

"We have already re-designed some suites in West, Haymaker, Goodnow and Marlatt halls. We have several different styles of suites already in use," said Chuck Werring, director of Housing and Dining Services.

The suites have been remodeled from the old-style rooms in present residence halls. There are three different styles of suites in use now.

The first style consists of one regular full-size room accompanied by a private bathroom roughly the size of half the full-size room. Some of the bathrooms have full baths, and others have only a shower.

"All the bathrooms have dual sinks and a separate shower/bath area," Werring said.

The second style is the size of one regular full-size room with an L shape for the living area, and the rest is the bathroom. The third style is a three-student room. There are two rooms with a bathroom, Werring said.

"Our next project is the renovation of the basement in Boyd Hall. This is where we will have our cluster living," Werring said.

The rooms will consist of a bedroom area, a separate living area with fireplace and a bathroom.

"The fireplaces in these rooms will be for aesthetics only," Werring said.

The future projects will consist of renovating part of Jardine Terrace Apartments to accommodate three-bedroom family housing. The plan will look at an apartment-village concept for further in the future.

There are also plans to renovate Derby Food Center. Plans include trying to accommodate students' changing needs. The Department of Housing and Dining Services hope the renovations will include a more flexible time schedule and a remodeled interior, which would look like a food court.

"We want to keep some vision for the future, and we know that things are going to change. We appreciate the history and tradition here at K-State, and we're excited about this," Werring said.

MEAT

During the willingness-to-pay survey, Manhattan residents were also asked to choose between packages of ground beef that were labeled regularly and ones that had special labels. Consumers were then asked to price the products according to their HACCP value, Ford said.

Results of the willingness-to-pay survey indicated people are willing to pay a slightly higher price for a product processed according to a HACCP plan, Grunewald said.

However, many of the participants said they thought HACCP programs were already in existence and that it should not be a pricing factor, Grunewald said.

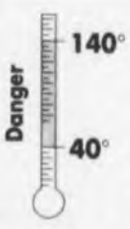
Many consumers indicated concerns about safe food processing techniques including meats. The specific study met with 36 participants from the Manhattan area.

The participants were screened for relevancy to the survey, because researchers wanted to target a small representation of Manhattan's population, Ford said. The study tried to target meat consumers.

The study's purpose was to educate the community about the implementation of HACCP programs and how to incorporate a similar program into everyday life, Ford said.

It teaches people how to reduce the effects of harmful bacteria. Basically, it teaches the difference between just cleaning and actually sanitizing, Grunewald said.

Other topics that were discussed during the study included consumer-based questions about the U.S. Department of Agriculture's 1994 decision to require safe-handling labels to appear on meat packages, Grunewald said.



Consumers questioned the information that USDA requires for the label. They liked the idea of including the information but thought it would be a better to list specific temperature ranges for the products, Grunewald said.

Food handling

Some food products may contain bacteria that could cause illness if the product is mishandled or cooked improperly. For your protection, follow these safe handling instructions.

- Keep refrigerated or frozen. Thaw in refrigerator or microwave.
- Keep raw meat and poultry separate from other foods. Wash working surfaces (including cutting boards), utensils and hands after touching raw meat or poultry.

Hot temperatures destroy bacteria. Cook food thoroughly so bacteria can't survive (Above 140 degrees Fahrenheit).

Most food-borne illness-causing bacteria do not grow well in refrigerators (Below 40 degrees Fahrenheit).

to take power.

"We have to find someone to lead the country," he said.

Stephan Tubene, president of Zairian Students of America at K-State, said many people support Etienne Tshisekedi, who was Prime Minister for a short while until Mobutu replaced him with Leon Kengo. Kengo is currently running the country.

Tubene said he thought if Mobutu died, the army could take power by force.

He said the return of educated people to Zaire would help democracy, but there is nothing there for educated people right now, so many of them are living elsewhere.

"I believe once the country is back again people will return," he said.

Cesar Guvele, graduate student in agricultural economics, said he thought the country had a bright future. He said they needed a good administration to tap the country's resources.

Guvele, who is originally from Uganda, said African people need to understand how governments function.

Valuable campus art lost in the twilight zone

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Caught between a museum and a campus.

It is art, and it is in the twilight zone.

Although the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art has provided a home for the K-State Art Collection, many campus pieces have found themselves in an identity crisis — an artistic twilight zone.

Campus buildings team with art, whether paintings in department offices, sculptures in a conference room or some odd piece stuck in a hallway.

Who decides if it is art? Who decides where it should be? Who owns it, the department or the University?

Most prominent of the pieces floating in this zone are the numerous works of internationally renowned artist Mitsugi Ohno.

Ohno, the retired senior master glass-blower of K-State, now works on his main hobby, his life work, of creating the glass-blown creations exhibited in the K-State Student Union and in the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building.

It's hard to attend K-State without noticing the intricate replications of Anderson Hall, the White House, an aircraft carrier and various other pieces displayed in plexiglass cases.

"My legacy to the world is my glass-blowing work for K-State," Ohno said. "I'm not making money. It's what I love doing."

But visitors to the campus now are hard-pressed to find Ohno's work, because it is spread out in three buildings.

The limited gallery space of the art museum would only allow Ohno's work to be exhibited temporarily, probably as part of a specific exhibit.

Although the Ohno sculptures are considered part of the K-State Art Collection, they have not been cataloged by the art museum staff, nor does the staff have plans to use the sculpture for exhibit.

"There are not any plans that I'm aware of for that material to enter our collection," Bill North, curator of the art museum, said. "We have no plans to obtain any of that material for the collection."

However, that statement conflicts with the understanding of the Department of Chemistry, which oversees and houses many of Ohno's pieces on campus.

Dale Hawley, head of the chemistry department, said some of the ownership has not been transferred to the art museum, but it was expected to happen.

"I'm not sure what Mr. Ohno's intent was for ownership," Hawley said.

Hawley said ownership of three ships, the Niña, the Pinta and the Santa Maria, has been transferred to the art museum.

"We'd be glad to keep them here, but the ownership of those three has been transferred to the Beach art museum," Hawley said.

"I don't really know the status of the others."

The art museum's intentions also conflict with those of Ohno, who has expressly said his pieces at K-State have been given to the museum for exhibit.

"I would eventually like all of it in the art museum," Ohno said.

Ohno said he wants his sculpture to be grouped together as opposed to spread out in many places.

Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, is a personal friend of Ohno's and oversees his sculptures on campus. Reagan also accompanied Ohno on two separate meetings with the emperor of Japan.

"Most of the pieces we're going to exhibit right where they are, because we would rather have them there than in the storage room of the art museum," Reagan said.

"We do plan to have an exhibit on art and glass in the next 18 months at the art museum," he said.

Reagan said it is rare for all the work of one artist to be exhibited in one place, even if a majority of the artist's work is owned by one entity.

What to do

Valuable art that belongs to K-State is lost. The Collegian thinks the art department and the Beach Art Museum should work together to bring all of the art together on campus.

Manhattan resident a renowned artist with displays at K-State, Smithsonian

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Practically considered a living treasure in Japan, Mitsugi Ohno remains one of Manhattan's most prized citizens.

A unique glass-blowing artist who creates scale models of famous buildings and warships with delicate drops of glass, Ohno has firmly cemented his reputation with K-State, having left the majority of his sculptures to the University.

He was nominated for Japan's highest honor, that of a living treasure, but was not eligible, because he became a U.S. citizen in 1970.

However, he is still kept in high regard in Japan.

In 1992, when the K-State football team was headed to Tokyo, Ohno went along to present a glass sculpture of Himeji Castle to the emperor of Japan.

"That's very special," Ohno said. "Usually, the Japanese emperor is presented many gifts, but he won't take them. By taking the gift, the emperor means he is a friend to me."

Ohno's work can be found in many prestigious collections, including collections in the White House, the Smithsonian Institution, the Eisenhower Museum, and the Imperial Palace in Japan.

While those institutions both occasionally and permanently exhibit Ohno's work, K-State seems at a loss for how to properly display them, because most of them are spread out in various campus buildings.

Recently, the Japan Culture and Information Center in Washington, D.C., has expressed interest in being host to an exhibit of Ohno's work.

Ohno's work is mainly handled by Charles Reagan, assistant to President Jon Wefald, and a friend of Ohno's.

Reagan said Ohno's scientific work is valuable to the Department of Chemistry, but one can't fault him for wanting to retire.

"He gives most of the things he does away," Reagan said. "He loves K-State and thinks the University has been good to him.

"Or there could be no room in his house."

Truthfully, the cases necessary to display Ohno's work would require much space, so Ohno keeps only small pieces at home.

Central to points raised by the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art staff concerning the acceptance of his work was whether the sculptures are art or decorative art, which the museum doesn't actively collect.

"Who decides if it's art?" Reagan asks. "That's something that's been fuzzy for some time."

Reagan said the state carriage presented to the MITSUGI OHNO created the Anderson Hall glass sculpture located in front of the K-State Union Bookstore. Ohno began creating scale models of famous buildings and warships in his native Japan. prince and princess of Japan is indisputably art.

The delicate nature and use of color in the carriage makes it a fine piece, even compared to Ohno's other work.

"The aircraft carriers puzzle me," Reagan said. "Everything else is in between."

Regardless of whether his work is an art, Ohno has been refining his processes for more than 50 years.

Born in Tochigi, Japan, on June 28, 1926, by the age of 13, Ohno had landed an apprenticeship with his uncle, a glass-blower, in Tokyo. It was during this six-year apprenticeship Ohno learned the foundations of glass-blowing.

"It is an old family tradition," Ohno said. "The reason is because it takes a very long time to master."

In 1947, Ohno began working as a glass blower at the Tokyo University in the chemistry department. Glass-blowing is a necessity for chemistry, because many unusual configurations are needed for laboratory research.

Ohno began glass-blowing at K-State in 1961, was appointed senior master glass blower in 1990 and retired in 1996 to commit full-time attention to his artistic glass-blowing.

"Nobody makes this kind of work in the world," Ohno said. "It takes patience."

Ohno's basement studio is quite sparse if one considers his intricately detailed sculptures. To begin a piece, he first draws it to scale similar to an architectural plan, with each elevation. From there, Ohno can begin the process of glass-blowing to bring the sculpture to form.

It isn't glass-blowing that brings him to Japan, but rather lecturing on his book, "The Biography of a Glass Blower in Kansas," an autobiographical account of his developed philosophy for life.

"My philosophy is very old. It's classic," Ohno said. "It's important to be honest, and money is not important."

"That's why people come to my lectures in Japan," he said. "They say I'm crazy for taking no money, but they think it's interesting."

Although glass-blowing is not a cheap concern, K-State has given Ohno many pieces of equipment to continue his work.

Is it hard for him to give all of his sculptures away?

"No, it's not too hard to part with them, because I take so much pride in giving them away."

LOST

"It's physically impossible to have everything in one place at one time," he said.

That is also the case with numerous wood sculptures created by Chester Peters, a much-beloved former faculty member at K-State who died recently.

The facilities department is housing three of his works in its conference room.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said designs have been completed for some time to create a pedestrian plaza near the sundial between Waters Hall and Farrell Library for the installation of the Peters sculptures.

"We haven't had a donor step forward to provide funds to install them or keep them up," Carter said.

However, Carter has reservations about whether the fragile works could be exhibited for long periods of time outdoors.

"One of the big concerns he and I both shared is that the tree that produced the pieces wasn't completely dried," Carter said. "The wood is subject to some checking and swelling. I don't know if I would want it out in the elements."

Carter said he's not sure if the sculptures would belong to the Department of Art or the art museum, but he's sure the pieces were given to the University.

"I would be happy for the Beach museum to hold these sculptures if they want to," he said. "I kind of feel obligated to hold onto them over here, because I worked with him when he came up with these ideas."

Also among the collection of facilities is various stonework from past buildings and the original campus waterpump, which Carter said he eventually wants to re-install on campus.

Until the art museum was developed and built, the art department was the caretaker of much of the K-State Art Collection. Since the art museum's October opening, however, most campus art has found its way to the museum's storage facilities.

"We are pretty much out of the collection business," Anna Holcombe, head of the art department, said.

The K-State Art Collection was maintained by the art department, because it originated and proliferated under the guide of art-department faculty. When the art faculty helped to realize the new art museum, the collection was placed in its proper home.

Although Peters' sculptures will either be installed in the plaza or stay at facilities, the possibility of creating a new space specifically for Ohno's work remains.

Reagan said, "I don't know if the Union would be a good place or not."

Prior to the construction of the art museum, there were plans to include Ohno's work in a special wing.

"We tried to talk the Japan Foundation into building a wing we could put it all together, but they declined," Reagan said.

However, Reagan said he would be surprised if in five years there were not talk of building an addition to the art museum.

Whether there would be room for Ohno's sculpture remains to be seen.

LOSS

stomped down into Buffalo territory at their 7-yard line.

Facing fourth down and 4 yards to gain, the Cats called a time out apparently to set up the finale to the drive.

But Kavanagh was again sacked by Ryan Olson, and the Buffaloes took over at their own 15.

"You get it down there, and you don't know what's going to happen. It's monumental," Snyder said.

"It was a little bit of a letdown emotionally, just to be able to drive the ball that far and use that much time, most of the third quarter, and not be able to get it into the end zone," he said. Kavanagh's efforts weren't all in vain Saturday. Kavanagh ended the night with 20 completions on 40 attempts for 163 yards. Kavanagh also recorded his longest rush of the year at the start of the fourth quarter with a 21-yard sprint that put the Wildcats in field position to drive on Colorado.

> "We've got one game left and a chance to end up 9-2. The sun is going to come up tomorrow, but it's disappointing."
> • BRIAN KAVANAGH
> WILDCAT QUARTERBACK

Both offenses remained scoreless in the second half, and the Buffaloes pulled out a win in Boulder, 12-0.

Not only did the loss shatter K-State's hopes of a Jan. 1 bowl game, but it was the first time it had been shut out since a 10-0 loss to Colorado in 1991.

"We've been here before, haven't we? We've got one game left and a chance to end up 9-2," Kavanagh said. "The sun is going to come up tomorrow, but it's disappointing."

Tape reveals ValuJet's last moments

SPEED

▶ The eight-minute tape taken from the cockpit recorder of ValuJet Flight 592 reveals a cause of the crash that killed 110 people this summer when the airplane crashed into the Everglades.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Passengers screamed "Fire! Fire! Fire!" and a flight attendant warned, "We can't get oxygen back there," during the final terrifying moments before ValuJet Flight 592 plunged into the Everglades, killing all 110 people aboard.

The chilling eight-minute tape from the cockpit voice recorder ends with the cockpit and cabin falling silent, leaving the sound of rushing air, perhaps from a cockpit window that had been opened to let the smoke out.

A transcript of the recording was released Monday as a hearing opened on the mistakes that led to the May 11 crash. Federal investigators believe 144 oxygen-generating canisters carried in the DC-9's cargo hold either ignited or fueled a fire.

Six minutes after takeoff from Miami International Airport, the pilot can be heard telling the co-pilot: "We got some electrical problems. ... We're losing everything."

A few seconds later, the voice recorder picked up screams of passengers in the cabin, including several women shouting, "Fire! Fire! Fire! Fire!"

During the next 51 seconds, shouts were heard from the cabin twice more, and a flight attendant only said, "Completely on fire," before the cabin fell silent. The last recorded voice from the plane was that of a crew member telling the tower, "We need the, uh, closest airport available."

The plane crashed two minutes and 22 seconds later.

Although the flight attendant warned that passengers could not get oxygen, National Transportation Safety Board investigator Greg Feith said there was not enough information to say what might have happened to the oxygen masks that drop down in front of passengers during an emergency.

Relatives of the victims said they hope the hearing will tell them why their loved ones died.

"I dreaded coming here, but this is something that I have to do in order to have closure," said Gwendolyn Marks, a nurse whose 23-year-old son died in the crash. "It may be painful, but it was my child, and I want to hear what was going through his mind, what was going on in those last minutes."

Investigators did not release the recording itself out of concern for the feelings of family members. That decision upset Richard Kessler, an Atlanta lawyer whose wife, Kathleen Kessler, was killed.

"I'm going to Washington after this to try to get them to change the law," Kessler said. He said he wanted to know if one of the voices repeatedly shouting "Fire" was his wife's.

By the time passenger screams were heard inside the aircraft, the decision had been made to try to return to Miami.

The tower controller, who was listening on a separate circuit and could not hear the commotion in the plane, asked what the problem was and was told, "Smoke in the cockp ... smoke in the cabin." The pilot decided to turn back, and the tower gave directions to return.

At the hearing, testimony and court documents focused on alleged blunders by a ValuJet subcontractor, SabreTech Corp., in the handling of the oxygen canisters, which were being flown as cargo. In many planes, the canisters are installed over the seats and supply oxygen to the emergency masks.

A stock clerk didn't know what oxygen generators were but weighed five boxes of them and labeled them for shipment to ValuJet's headquarters in Atlanta, the documents said.

Shipping caps are supposed to be installed on the canisters to prevent them from activating by accident, but none were requested by SabreTech mechanics, the documents showed.

SabreTech President Steven Townes defended his company's work, saying mechanics believed they had disabled the triggering mechanisms of the canisters before they were packed.

Drought causes next wheat harvest to be more promising

DEBBIE WOOD
staff reporter

Next year's wheat harvest looks more promising than last year's.

Candice Bowman, marketing project manager for the Kansas City Board of Trade, said wheat was in higher demand because of the drought last fall.

On April 26, the Board of Trade saw the highest price for wheat in 120 years at $7.44 a bushel.

The price has dropped dramatically, and December's price is predicted to be $4.28.

According to KSU Ag Update, wheat prices for fall 1997 are predicted to be about 50 cents above $4.

Insects, disease and mold are a few of the problems wheat farmers must face from season to season. Many of them use pesticides to combat the effects.

"Some of it depends on Mother Nature. Extremes either way are harmful," Bowman said.

Don Hartner, a local farmer, farms 250-300 acres of wheat. He said the weather is a key factor in determining a good wheat crop.

"It looks real good right now. I treat for diseases by using a grain-box treatment. It's a powder that I sprinkle on the wheat as I drill it," Hartner said.

When the flood of 1993 hit the Midwest, water levels were so high for so long farmers had mold on their crops.

Another factor influencing the wheat crop is world trade. Several countries produce large volumes of wheat year after year.

"We also have more competition this year in the world market," Bowman said. "The United States exports one-third of its wheat, and Australia and Argentina have large crops to export also."

In fact, the U.S. produces more wheat than it consumes, but coming into 1996, Kansas had tight wheat stocks, and the storage levels are still lower than normal.

Bowman said the Department of Agriculture's storage levels will rise in the next year to provide more of a cushion against crop disaster.

There are a couple of things that determine a good wheat crop.

"It depends on how much the bushel weighs. If it's heavy, that means it has good protein content. Depending on the protein content determines what kind of product it will be made into. Businesses have a specific percentage they want," Bowman said.

STEPHEN GIORGIANNI, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, tosses an apple into a box for the apple-bobbing competition. The apples were floating in ice water, making the competition cold and challenging.

LET'S GET CRAZY

Students compete to start Homecoming at Crazy Cat Kickoff

R.J. DIEPENBROCK
staff reporter

Monday night it was not a raging bull stomping around in Weber Arena. Rather, it was more than 100 students participating in Crazy Cat Kickoff, just one event to inaugurate Homecoming Week.

Sponsored by the Association of Residence Halls, the five-event competition had participants from many of the residence halls bobbing for apples, picking Starburst Jelly Beans out of a pool of oatmeal, and searching for pennies in a bowl of flour. This was done in the name of fun and K-State spirit.

Strong 1 or the Pea Shooters, finished first with 68 points after entering the final event five points behind the Mooreons from Moore Hall sixth floor, which placed second with 63 points. Tied for second was S&M, or Smurthwaite Scholarship House.

"There are 10 teams with 10 members each," said Jay Witt, KSUARH vice president and junior in economics . "They compete for fun and spirit."

Witt said while there was no prize for the winning team, the team that won would receive points toward Homecoming week competitions.

Shirley Robinson, KSUARH historian and junior in computer science, said she competed last year, but could not this year due to the fact she was taking pictures of the event.

"It was really fun," Robinson said. "You end up getting extremely dirty."

From the Pea Shooters, Brett Randall, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said the flour event was his favorite.

"I didn't do this last year," Randall said. "It was a lot of fun."

In this event, five members of each team crowded around bowls full of flour, and used straws to blow the flour away to find five pennies.

The Pea Shooters' Erin Garletts, junior in elementary education, said the oatmeal event was fun.

"The oatmeal felt good between my toes," Garletts said.

For this event, five members of each team sat in a kiddie pool filled with oatmeal and had 10 seconds to dig for jelly beans with their hands and toes.

"It felt really weird," Jennifer Ruttan, senior in elementary education, said.

Ruttan, a member of the West Hall/Marlatt Hall team otherwise known as The Bomb, said she kept pulling feet out of the oatmeal instead of jelly beans.

Jade Gleave, freshman in electrical engineering and member of The Bomb, said the oatmeal event was cool.

"I'd do it as many times as I could," Gleave said.

Farmers might be able to prevent low cattle prices from repeating

DEBBIE WOOD
staff reporter

Earlier this spring, area cattle farmers and ranchers were feeling the brunt of low cattle prices and high costs of maintaining their herds.

If farmers — with the help of Mother Nature — can prevent history from repeating itself, there could be a turnaround as early as 1998.

> "We haven't suffered a blow from the past year's ordeal, but I don't think prices are going to be much better in a year as they are right now.
> • PETE ADAMS
> FRESHMAN IN ANIMAL SCIENCE

Cow and calf operations started losing money in 1995 and 1996, and Jim Mintert, extension agricultural economist, said he looks for the liquidation phase of the cattle cycle to last into 1997.

"The cattle sector moves through a long-term cycle that, over the last 70 years or so, has averaged about 10 years in length. The cycle is characterized by six years of growth and three to four years of liquidation," Mintert said.

One factor was the value of the Mexican peso falling in 1994. Because of this, Mexico was exporting large numbers of feeder steers into the United States.

"Northern Mexican cattlemen were faced with a choice of selling cattle for pesos, which had a rather uncertain value, or shipping those cattle across the border and selling them for dollars," Mintert said.

Another reason the farmers are losing money in their operations is that corn prices were high this season. Because of a drought, the corn crop was not as large as expected, and farmers entered 1996 with tight corn reserves.

Some farmers don't feel the effects as severely as others. The bigger an operation, the more it is able to absorb the shocks of rising corn prices and decreasing cattle prices.

Pete Adams, freshman in animal sciences, hails from a farm in Maple Hill, where his father handles between 1,300 and 1,500 head of weaned calves.

"We haven't suffered a blow from the past year's ordeal, but I don't think prices are going to be much better in a year as they are right now. We ought to be creeping out of the red, though," Adams said.

Adams said that even if the cattle prices continue to decline, people who have been in the business for a number of years will stick around.

"Some people will wait it out no matter what the state," he said.

Theron Haresnape, junior in animal sciences, shares some of the same views as Adams.

"I think it will probably come up some. The price right now is higher than it was one year ago," Haresnape said.

Haresnape's family farms in Lebanon, and he said they, too, did not feel the effects of low prices because his family did not have any cattle to sell earlier this year.

Mintert said five- to six-weight steers are trading in Dodge City at $61 per 100 pounds of weight.

"My forecast is that in 1997, those same five- to six-weight steers in Dodge City will probably average in the high 60s, and a year from now, those cattle could easily be trading in the 70s,"

Speaker explains inconsistencies in JFK assassination ideas

BOB HARRIS points out flaws in photos associated with the shooting of President Kennedy. Harris delivered his speech, "Who shot JFK?" Monday evening in Union Forum Hall.

Be aware of the incredible power we have as individuals.

This is the main point Bob Harris wanted students to walk away with last night after his lecture, "Who Shot JFK?"

"I am just an ordinary person like you," he said. "There is a tremendous amount of information out there if you just take the time to look for it."

Harris is a comedian, author and political activist who spends most of his time researching government files. He got his start in the 1980s by becoming one of the hottest political comics in the Chicago area. He soon became known for his humorous talk that mocked the official version of the John F. Kennedy assassination and its mindless recital by the media.

Harris has since set aside his stand-up career and is now focusing in on lecturing. He has lectured at more

The fighter's condition worsened Sunday after surgeons operated twice to remove blood that was putting pressure on his brain.

Di Chiara, the seventh Italian professional boxer to die from injuries sustained in the ring, lapsed into a deep coma Saturday night shortly after a technical knockout during the final round of an Italian title bout against champion Vincenzo Imparato at Avenza.

Odomes sustained a possible injury to his left hip, as well as cuts and bruises on his head.

The wreck was another blow to the 31-year-old cornerback, who was Pro Bowler in 1992 and 1993 with Buffalo, tying for the NFL lead in interceptions in 1993.

There weren't any green poker visors or ominous figures puffing cigars in a dimly lighted room. But the cracking of shuffling cards made it clear that some serious cards were being dealt at the Spadestacular card tournament Sunday night in Union Station.

This is the second year the Union Program Council special events committee has had the spades tournament. Sixteen two-person teams battled it out for spades supremacy and cash prizes of up to $80 for the winning team in the double-elimination contest.

Patrick Carney, senior in political science and history and UPC president, said Spadestacular is designed to attract people who like to play cards, especially spades. Carney said he's been playing spades for more than 14 years.

"On average, I play about 15 to 20 hours a month. It's just one of those games I enjoy playing," Carney said.

The tournament uses the game of spades because it isn't complicated, and many people play it.

"Spades is a fairly simple game to learn. Bidding is the most difficult aspect," Carney said.

In a game of spades, 13 cards are dealt to each player. All players bid on how many tricks they can take in the hand. Players must play a card in the suit that is led. When they don't have any cards in that suit, they can trump in with a spade. When playing with partners, the players bid as a team. For example, if a team bids seven and takes seven tricks it is awarded 70 points. If the team doesn't reach the bid, it goes set and loses 70 points.

Generally, people play until one team has reached a certain number of points. Because of time constraints, the tournament limited play in each round to two hands.

Julie Grimes, graduate student in student counseling and personal services and UPC adviser, said the tournament attracts the serious player.

"These are the kind of people that play cards at two o'clock in the morning on the weekends that want to get together with other people who are playing cards at two in the morning," she said.

K-State research links farmers to increased risk of cancer

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

Recent K-State research found Kansas farmers might be at an increased risk for certain cancers.

Scott Frey, professor of sociology, found Kansas farmers are 20-40 percent more likely to die from prostate cancer, brain cancer, non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and leukemia than those who are not farmers.

Frey's findings were published in the Transactions of Kansas Academy of Science.

Frey started his study in 1983 because he noticed an unequal distribution of risks.

Other research has shown there are differential risks depending on class, gender, race and jobs.

The research included mortality rates of Kansas farmers up to 1989.

The research included 27 different cancers but found the previous four site-specific cancers kept recurring as causes of death.

Frey said his research was consistent with other findings from other agricultural states.

Although there is no direct evidence why Kansas farmers are at an increased risk for these cancers, Frey said the general notion is Kansas farmers are at greater exposure to environmental agents.

Frey said there is no proof the chemicals, pesticides and fertilizers farmers use are responsible for the increased risk, but findings show a high correlation.

Frey says farmers should follow chemical-label guidelines and be careful when handling them.

Frey's research on Kansas farmers might have a large impact on the general population.

"Just like the miners were the canaries of the mining days, farmers may be the canaries for modern society," Frey said.

Farmers might show the effects of environmental agents more than non-farmers do, but with a variety of chemicals being diffused into the environment, these cancers could be increasing in the general population, Frey said.

Even though farmers have an increased risk for the four site-specific cancers, they have a 5-percent lower chance of getting all cancers combined, Frey said.

"I found that farmers' overall cancer rate was lower than that of the general population of Kansas," Frey said.

"This could be due to their healthy lifestyle."

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

University authorities should try to ensure Homecoming is all-inclusive

Homecoming week is upon us, and greeks and people who live in residence halls will be joining in activities to bolster the spirit of the fans and the football team.

WHY WE CARE

Homecoming week activities should not be limited to greeks and people who live in residence halls. Everyone should join in the spirit.

The problem is that the entire campus community supports the football team, but only 25 percent of the campus is involved in Homecoming activities.

Many other universities attempt to include the entire student body in most of their Homecoming activities. It's a huge deal — greeks, residence-hall people and independents all living and celebrating together toward a common cause. Isn't it nirvana?

K-State needs to do the same thing.

The University authorities in charge of Homecoming need to actively pursue inclusion of the entire student body.

K-State, in the past few years, has earned the reputation of having some of the best football fans in college football.

If this is true — and why wouldn't it be? — why is only 25 percent of the student population involved in the activities that honor our football team?

Perhaps it would be difficult to integrate independents into the greek- and residence-hall-oriented activities. Certainly, many of the activities would have to be restructured, because there would be fewer people in the independent groups.

Maybe a friendly competition between the greeks and independents would be a fun addition to Homecoming-week activities.

And maybe instead of Homecoming ambassadors, a crowning of a king and queen where everyone has equal opportunity would be in order.

But the bottom line is this: Homecoming is about spirit. And the more people we include in this celebration of spirit for our football team, the better.

From the mouths of babes

Kids — they ask the darndest questions

As a student teacher finally within grasp of my certification, I am beginning to feel more like an old hand in front of the classroom.

I don't get nervous. I know exactly what is going on and who is paying attention. I know what's coming next. I'm developing that teacher ESP that scares students.

What sometimes takes me aback are the nutty questions students ask me or the statements they make to me. Sometimes it's the circumstances. Sometimes it's the individual doing the asking. Sometimes it's the nature of the question.

The following are real questions asked of me in the last two weeks. I was so intrigued by the nature and variety of questions or demands for me I began to write them down. Here, in somewhat specific order, are what my students want to know:

What should I do now, Miss Little?
Do you like what I'm wearing, Miss Little?
Why are you wearing that, Miss Little?
Miss Little's wearing JEANS!
Do we have to read this?
Miss Little, will you give me 50 cents?
OK, can I borrow 50 cents?
That's not a cuss word, Miss Little.
Coooooool hair, Miss Little.
Miss Little, was that you at Quik Trip Saturday?
Miss Little, is Beowulf real?
What do you know about calculus, Miss Little?
Miss Little, do you smoke?
K-State sucks, Miss Little.
Where should this comma go, Miss Little?
Will you come to our game, Miss Little?
Do you have any yarn, Miss Little?
So, WHY do we have to read this?
Do I have to?
OK, Miss Little — make me.
Where am I?
How do you spell (fill in any word — cat, for instance)?
Listen to me read this.
Do you drink, Miss Little?
Would you write this for me, Miss Little?
Let me see that glue.
Hey, that's from "Pulp Fiction!"
What class is this?
Miss Little, should I get my hair cut?
Do you go to church, Miss Little?
Slow down, Miss Little.
I didn't do it, Miss Little!
Do you have a sword we could use? Or a knife or something?
Where's my (again, fill in any item), Miss Little?
Miss Little, what's for lunch?
What page are we on, Miss Little?
What book do I need, Miss Little?
Miss Little, how much is that worth?
When is it due? (followed by ... Are you SURE?)
Do you have a boyfriend, Miss Little?
Why aren't you married, Miss Little?
Miss Little, how old are you?
How old is your mom?
Do you write about us for your school paper, Miss Little?
Can we see it?
Miss Little, you wore those shoes yesterday.
Got a fork?
What was your ACT score, Miss Little?
Shawnee Mission West sucks, Miss Little.
Miss Little, can I have some of your migraine stuff?
Who should I ask to Homecoming, Miss Little?
Should I wear this? (the item in question — thigh-high vinyl white boots)
Have you tried pot, Miss Little?
Did you have braces, Miss Little?
That's wrong, Miss Little.
Wanna dance, Miss Little?
Would you go to Homecoming with me, Miss Little?
Did they teach you that in teacher school, Miss Little?
Miss Little, you've got rubber cement in your hair.
I didn't do it!
Miss Little, why didn't you go to KU?
Miss Little, what do you do on the weekends? Read?
I need a safety pin, Miss Little.
Is this a sentence?
Sing us a song, Miss Little!

And finally, at 9:27 a.m., Oct. 24, one of my students sauntered up to my desk and asked — in front of several people — "Miss Little, how much is an abortion?"

I looked at her carefully. "You know, I really don't know — maybe you should ask —"

"I know," one of my male students in the front row said. "It'll cost ya around $450.

"But you have to shop around," he added.

"Thanks," she said, then sat down.

I'm glad sometimes I don't know all the answers.

Reader says she was misquoted in 'Hair' story

Editor,

Why is it that Collegian reporters feel completely unrestricted in their use of quotation marks? It has long been my understanding that when you put a statement in quotation marks, it represents an exact statement made by the person being interviewed.

I have often, very often, been misquoted, improperly paraphrased or had my statements taken completely out of context by Collegian reporters, but never as abominably as in the article written by Seth Gurss ("Hair," Nov. 14) who managed to do all of the aforementioned.

There is one paragraph in the article that makes absolutely no sense. If you are going to paraphrase or misquote, at least come up with something congruent and interesting. It is a shame that the reporter didn't find the time to talk with Luke Kahlich, the director and choreographer of the production.

As I mentioned to Gurss, Kahlich is the person closest to this production. He could provide the best insight into our production of "Hair."

He has been working on it since last spring. Why was he not interviewed?

The next time Collegian reporters come knocking on my door, they should be prepared for a long interview, as I intend to write down each of my answers, date and sign them before passing them on.

Tuition increase more valid than editors' problems

Editor,

On Nov. 15, it was reported that the Kansas Board of Regents was looking at increasing housing and academic fees at state universities.

As a college student, I would think that this might be important, yet it was only reported on the second page in the city and state section.

It was reported that the increase in academic fees would be small, ranging from $2 to $9 per credit hour.

Hello, is anyone in there? This is an increase of anywhere from 3 percent to 14 percent. If a student takes 15 hours per semester, that student is looking at an increase of anywhere from $30 to $135. It would seem to me that this is not a small increase.

Why doesn't one of your editors write about this issue instead of wasting valuable ink on their personal problems?

Miss America, apple pie and BEER?

Columnist grateful television networks respect beer-drinking Americans enough to ban hard-liquor advertisements

MY

Keely SCHIELDS

So distillers have given up their old voluntary ban on airing liquor advertisements. They'd like to open the floodgates and let flow with the hard stuff.

They'd like to, that is, but ABC, CBS and NBC will have none of it.

It would be bad news for families, say the networks, says President Clinton.

I say so, too. After all, we're not talking beer anymore. We're not talking about a glass of champagne between lovers. We're dealing with burn-all-the-way-down, 80-proof, knock-you-on-your-butt liquor. Bourbon. Sloe gin. Vodka. Rum.

Tequila!

Just for a moment, let me talk about distinctions. What I have just mentioned are a few varieties of hard booze, as opposed to softer, gentler kinds of alcohol. What makes them hard is that they contain 35 percent, 40 percent and often much higher percentages of alcohol by volume.

In contrast, beer is more like 3.2-percent alcohol by volume. That makes it a soft drink. It's a well-known fact, too, that you have to drink a whole heck of a lot of it to achieve the effects of hard liquor.

Just like a person with a hard personality, hard liquor isn't something to mess around with. Because it can be made yummy, or even undetectable, depending on the things it's immersed in, it certainly calls for extra care in handling.

Hence, it's a good thing that young people will not be subjected to advertisements for this sort of thing. If television or radio were actually to air these ads, just imagine the shameless techniques that would be employed in making alcohol appeal to children.

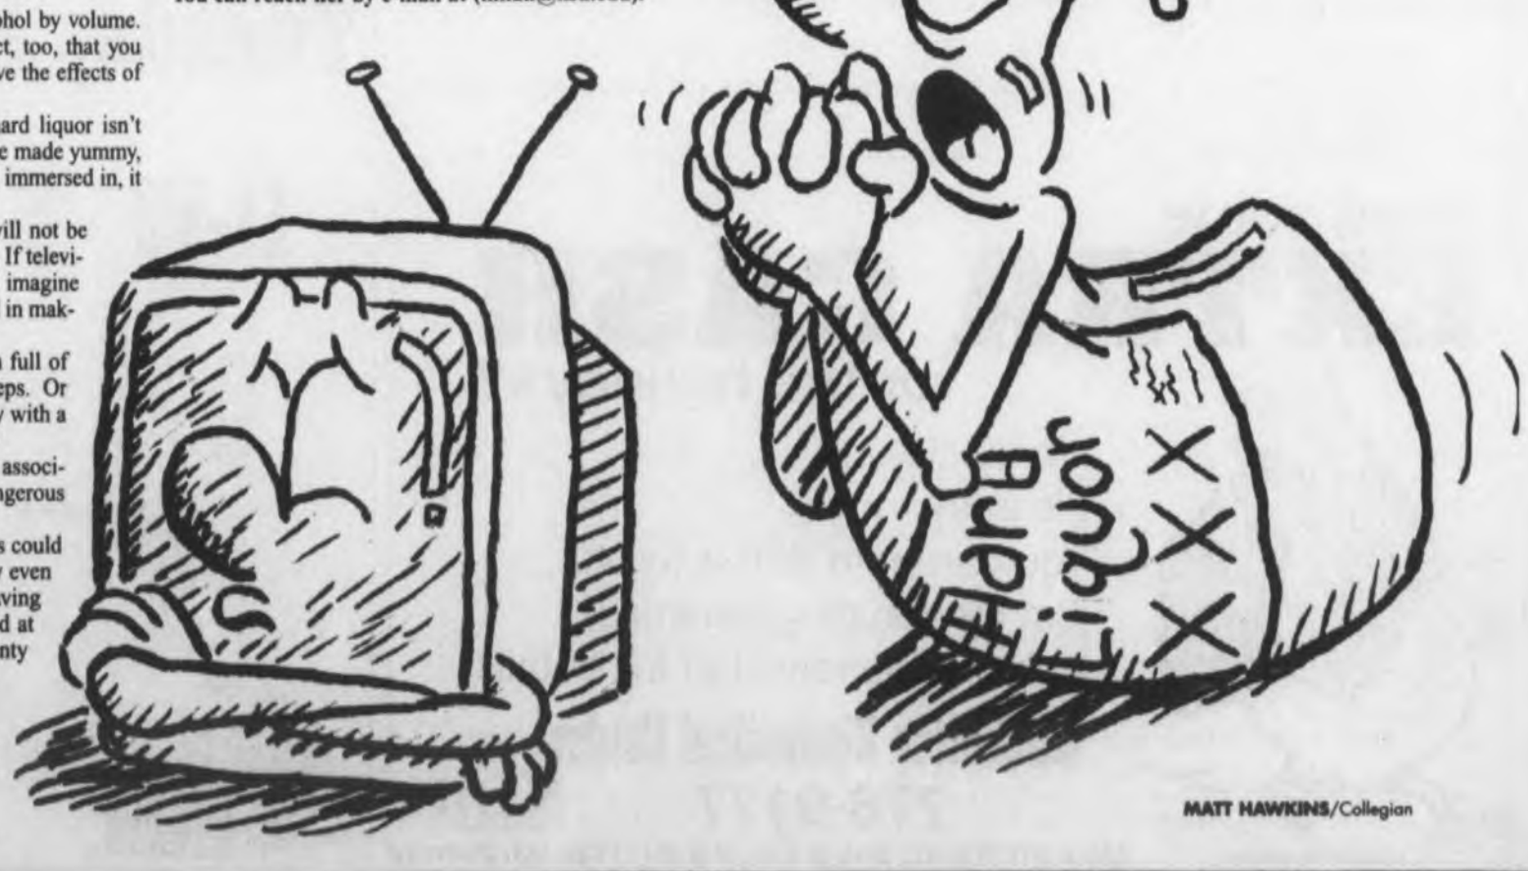
I wonder if they might show an elegant room full of silver-haired society ladies, tipsy on mint juleps. Or would they present a smooth, Sinatra-looking guy with a pinky ring, deftly clinking the rocks in his glass?

Without a doubt, this kind of glamour, when associated with alcoholic beverages, would be a dangerous thing.

I realize it's difficult to believe advertisements could be so irresponsible, but these ads would probably even depict scenes of beautiful people laughing and having a swell time. They'd be smiling at each other and at the drinks in their hands — smiling at the certainty that they are all going to see a little action before the evening is through.

Goodness! What would become of our country if something like that were to show up on our TV screens?

I shudder to think.



Even so, I think. I think back to a more innocent day — a crisp January day when adorable little bottles took to the field and, to the delight of all, tossed the ol' pigskin around a bit.

I think of a time when gorgeous, busty women hovered lovingly around average-Joe types, who were simply watching the game, being guys and sipping on suds.

These are the advertisements I cut my teeth on. I have no children, but if I did, these are the good, clean, wholesome advertisements I would want them to see, too.

I think the recent moral stand taken on the issue of airing hard-liquor ads deserves a round of applause. With the assurance that my children will be safe from hard-liquor smut, I'll sleep peacefully at night, knowing that they will grow up to be good beer-drinking Americans.

Coach ponders his resignation at Notre Dame

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Lou Holtz has his players, fans and the media hanging on his every word.

Holtz

He's expected to announce sometime this week that he will leave after his 11th season at Notre Dame. While he won't confirm it, he's done nothing to deny it, either.

"We can talk about this forever, but there isn't much I'm going to say," he said Sunday. "But there's a time and a place for everything. There's a time and a place to address certain questions. There's a time and a place of who to address it to. Right now, in the media is not the time."

So why the big mystery?

There's a possibility that Holtz truly hasn't made up his mind, but that's doubtful. The remarks he's made in the past week point to his leaving, and athletic director Mike Wadsworth said Saturday that Holtz has discussed his plans with him and the Rev. William Beauchamp, the university's executive vice president.

> "We can talk about this forever, but there isn't much I'm going to say. But there's a time and a place for everything. There's a time and a place to address certain questions. ... Right now, in the media, is not the time."
> • LOU HOLTZ
> NOTRE DAME FOOTBALL COACH

But Wadsworth won't say anything more, preferring to let Holtz make the announcement.

"I think he probably has a clear idea of what he wants to do," Wadsworth said. "We're supporters of Lou Holtz, but we will honor his decision."

Holtz's wife, Beth, has been out of town most of the week, and he might be waiting until she returns to make his announcement. It's also possible he wants the university to have a new coach lined up — or at least have a good idea of who it will be — before he steps down.

Topping the list are Northwestern coach Gary Barnett and Bob Davie, the current Irish defensive coordinator. Wisconsin coach Barry Alvarez, a former Irish assistant, also has been mentioned.

BRIAN CORRELL, freshman in mechanical engineering, takes one final look back into the Cessna 182 and his friends before leaping out at 5,000 feet. Correll landed safely.

TAKING THE PLUNGE

Parachuting Club plummets for thrills

STORY BY ABBI HAKE • PHOTOS BY CLIF PALMBERG

BRIAN CORRELL, freshman in mechanical engineering, looks on as Lowell Henning takes off. After takeoff, Henning took the Cessna 182 to 5,000 feet, and the three passengers jumped out.

KIEV WILLIAMS, Manhattan, packs the lines into his parachute pack before jumping Sunday morning. Williams has logged 37 jumps.

Want to jump at this chance?

Get $100 ready for your first jump, and contact Eric Wessel at 776-0890 for more details about K-State's Parachuting Club.

Anyone can do it. All it takes is $100 and enough guts to jump out of a moving airplane from high above the Earth.

The $100 pays for instruction, gear rental and the jump itself.

But the guts pay for a great time and an incredible adrenaline rush.

Six first-time jumpers from K-State and Manhattan experienced the rush Sunday afternoon at Wamego Airport.

This tiny airport 2 miles east of Wamego is home to the K-State Parachuting Club. There, in the first hangar, are two airplanes, a bunch of parachutes and members of the club who are addicted to the rush they experienced after their first jump and who are willing to teach their technique to others.

"Everybody wants to try it one time. Some people get hooked on it," parachuting instructor Eric Wessel said.

Wessel, senior in mechanical engineering, said everyone has different reasons for wanting to take the course, but most just do it because it looks exciting.

"It's something I've always wanted to try," Ben Sigg, freshman in architectural engineering, said.

Manhattan resident Dhana Sorell said the jump was a personal achievement for her.

"It was just a goal I had. I needed to challenge myself," she said.

Wessel and Jesse Magaña, the other instructor for this weekend's course in skydiving, began the two-day course Friday night by showing a video and teaching students how to exit the plane, fly the canopy, land the canopy and how to handle certain emergency situations.

The next morning was supposed to be the day of the jump, but the jumpers were kept on the ground by high winds and rain.

So the group reconvened Sunday morning to finish what it had set out to accomplish.

Six students eagerly pulled on their flight suits, all chatting excitedly about the adventure they were about to embark upon.

After the suits, they slid into the harnesses that held their two parachutes, the main chute and the reserve.

Next, they slipped on form-fitting helmets and goggles.

After several equipment checks by the instructors, three students, an instructor and a pilot climbed into the small Cessna 182 and buckled themselves in for their ride in the sky.

The remaining students stood on the ground outside the hangar, waiting for their turn and watching the plane's ascent and their classmates' descent.

Ten minutes later, the plane was at the proper altitude, and the first student-jumper was out of the plane. A body fell from the plane for a few seconds. Then the chute deployed, and Sorell's red- and black-striped chute could be seen gracefully floating toward the Earth.

"I feel so good that I did this," Sorell said once she'd landed.

The good feeling does not come without a lot of fears, though.

Wessel said no one usually exhibits a lot of fears during the course. But he said once they get in the airplane, they are a little more nervous.

"I've never had a person not jump. Anybody we put in the airplane we feel is prepared to do it," Wessel said.

Students eventually advance from static line jumps, which automatically deploy their parachute, to free fall jumps, during which they pull the rip cord themselves.

With advancement in training, students and experienced jumpers pay less money each time. Experienced jumpers only pay $7-$12.

Wessel said most skydiving injuries are minor, usually broken bones from rough landings.

Students who go through the course are drilled on proper landing procedures.

"We don't want people to freak out if something goes wrong. We practice it over and over until we're sure they can handle it," Wessel said.

Wildcat teams fare poorly at weekend district competition

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

The K-State men's and women's cross country teams finished their fall season Saturday in the District V regionals at Bradley University.

To qualify for nationals, a team must place in the top two, and the top three individuals not on the top two teams also qualify. Neither scenario came true for the Wildcats as the men's team finished fourth in the regional and the women's team placed sixth.

Individually, two runners finished just one place away from making nationals. Senior Ryan Clive-Smith and Samantha McNamara finished in ninth place overall in their respective men's and women's events and fourth individually outside the top two teams.

Other than Clive-Smith, who led the men, Chris May finished 13th, Zack Davies finished 25th, David Dominguez finished 26th, Brent Stover finished 38th, and Paul Birnbaum finished 45th.

> "Hindsight being 20/20, it's easy to look at what he did and maybe second-guess our strategy.
> • TERRY DRAKE
> CROSS COUNTRY COACH

One disappointment on the men's side was the final placing of Clive-Smith. Cross country coach Terry Drake said part of Clive-Smith's placing was due to a strategy error to get him in the top three.

"We sent Ryan out after the guy who we figured would finish in the third in the race," Drake said. "It turned out that the guy was sick, and he dropped out about halfway through the race. Hindsight being 20/20, it's easy to look at what he did and maybe second-guess our strategy. I felt real comfortable with what we had him do. It just didn't materialize like we thought it would."

Clive-Smith ended up running most of the race by himself, battling the cold and the wind, and was overcome at the end of the race by runners behind him.

Drake said he was happy with the rest of the men's performance.

"Our men's team was pretty good," Drake said. "At 8K, we were probably in second or third. We had four guys who went and ran their hearts out and wanted to go to nationals. We just weren't able to hold on."

On the women's side behind McNamara, Cristy Swartz finished 21st, Ashlie Kinton finished 44th, Emily Diederich finished 64th, Anita Hallauer finished 76th and Ann Golubski finished 87th.

Drake said the women's sixth-place finish was due to a long season of mishaps for the team.

"We got hit with injuries and weird things all year long," Drake said. "Ann Golubski hurt her knee falling out of bed, Anita Hallauer got mono and wasn't supposed to return this season, and Kathryn Wolfram never recovered from a hip flexor."

Yet the outlook for next season looks bright for the women despite losing their No. 1 runner McNamara.

"We return four really good runners on the women's side," Drake said. "Cristy Swartz, Ashlie Kinton, Kelly Andra and Kathryn Wolfram all will make up a good core nucleus for us. Even if we don't get any recruits, we'll have a good team next year."

Just some random reflections about roundball past and present

MY

John
BALMER

Fewer than two official games have been played in the 1996-97 NCAA basketball season, and already a giant has been knocked upside the head. Friday night David was played by Clemson, and Clemson beat Goliath — the Kentucky Wildcats like a rented mule.

Now, while all this mayhem was going down under the Hoosier Dome, I was cooped up in Bramlage Coliseum witnessing a Cat massacre of my own. After getting my wits together and reviewing the events of the evening, it dawned on me that this season is gonna be filled with enough malarky and madness to unravel the sweater right off Bob Knight.

Before we go national, let's start in our own Bramlage backyard. This year's Tom Asbury-led unit has been picked by the Big 12 media to finish ninth in the conference.

This ranking seems a wee bit harsh considering the opponents K-State faces. With early-season games against schools represented by Kangaroos, Shockers and Musketeers, the Cats should enter their Jan. 4 showdown with KU undefeated. A loss at Michigan State on Dec. 21 would be excusable, but the Cats should prevail.

The winter break confrontation at Bramlage will have many interesting side notes. Most notably, KU point guard and all-America candidate Jacque Vaughn is expected to return to action after wrist surgery, and who better to return against but the Cats?

The contest is also set to air on ESPN, so Dickie V. and his legion of high-decibel verbs should also be courtside in Cat country.

While Kansas is Vitale's pick to take it all this year, this top billing all hinges on whether Vaughn can recover and lead the Hawks.

If he's not 100 percent, look for there to be an upset in Aggieville and heartache for the lord of loudness, Dickie V.

All right, enough with the local scene. Let's take a gander at the rest of the roundball world and the teams that will make noise in '97.

South Carolina is primed and polished to be the sleeper of the season. The Gamecocks lost only one member of the '96 squad and feature a three-guard rotation that might just be the best in the land.

If the Cocks can chalk up some wins outside Columbia, look for an NCAA tourney berth in their future and an increase in sales of those white, bar-lined Cocks hats made by the Game. You know, the hats often worn by fraternal dudes and torn beyond recognition. If USC improves, the number of Cock-hat sightings will increase tenfold.

Michigan is also set to step it up this year. Still recovering from bad post-Fab Five aftertaste, this year's Motown machine is led by — surprise — no freshmen.

The Wolverines will finally have some stable juniors to lead them, most notably Maurice Taylor, who should blow up big time. While finding playing time for all this talent has constantly troubled coach Steve Fisher, this season should reap different results.

My roundball goggles see the maize and blue beasts returning to the Sweet Sixteen and, with a little luck, the Final Four.

My final pondering of the season has to be the correctly titled Western Athletic Conference, because this grouping of 16 schools seems almost too big for its britches.

On the plus side, though, the wiggity-WAC does house Utah and Fresno State, two mean mamma jammas who can play some serious ball. Although these two foes don't meet in the regular season because of the plethora of intra-conference match-ups a 16-team conference must have, keep your fingers crossed for a possible conference tournament clash.

If this happens, sit back, pop open a can of Yoohoo and enjoy this one, because how can you not enjoy the sideline ravings of Utah coach Rick Majerus and his enemy, the great shark Jerry Tarkanian. Plus, baby-faced wonder and Utah forward Keith Van Horn is a sight to see.

That about wraps up my reflections on roundball. After the thrashing I witnessed Friday, I just had to acknowledge the beauty of Big Monday, Billy Packer and all the other woodcourt wonders that build up to March Madness.

So if I didn't tickle your fancy with this column, I must apologize. But with nothing floating through my mind but hoops, I have to quote Beastie Boy Mike D: "My head was like a sieve, and I had to turn it out."

Center gets a new look

A real site with actual needs. Second-year architecture students do not often receive assignments like this.

But this semester they did, and many of their design proposals are on display until Nov. 28 in the lobby of the Manhattan Center for the Arts.

Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture and coordinator of the second-year design studios, proposed the community-based academic project focused on the exterior of the arts center. Four of the six design-studio faculty members adopted the project, he said.

All the Manhattan Center for the Arts' outdoor space is devoted to parking.

The project required students to retain 60 parking spaces and incorporate a covered drop-off at the front entrance. The rest was up to them.

"The students were asked to envision what activities might take place in the outdoor realm which would extend the ability of the center to provide programming to the community," Madlen Simon, assistant professor of architecture, said.

Proposals included areas for outdoor theater, rooftop performances, art classes, exhibits and dance parties, Simon said. Other ideas included underground parking, covered walkways, gardens and playgrounds.

Students had the opportunity to visit the arts center and interact with its staff while creating proposals.

"This was actually an opportunity to get a hands-on feel of what it'll be like," Ian Sinnett, sophomore in architecture, said. "The project was also an excellent way for the center to get multiple ideas of what to do with it."

The Manhattan Center for the Arts welcomed the College of Architecture's project idea.

"It was a really good exercise," said Penny Senften, the Manhattan Center for the Arts program director. "One of the reasons was because it brought together the two entities, the center and the University."

Senften sat in on the end-of-project reviews along with other Manhattan Center for the Arts staff, community leaders, faculty and advanced architecture students. Students and faculty worked together to select 23 projects to display in the lobby of the arts center.

"We took as many as we could fit in there," Simon said.

The exhibit allows students to share their work with the community.

"I think I am lucky to be able to say that I didn't just do the work, but it's actually out there," Stephanie Lockemann, sophomore in architecture, said. "I'm going to dare to call us artists, and it's important for us to have a chance to show what we are doing."

She said sharing their work is part of the design process.

"We actually have a chance to close the cycle of perception," she said. "We don't often get that chance. It often just ends in the department."

Art center a holiday haven, perfect place for art lovers

ASHLEY CELLER
staff reporter

The Manhattan Center for the Arts could be the perfect destination for those who love art.

The Manhattan Area Weavers and Spinners Guild is a group of 11 people who make fiber-related items.

George Eads, a member of the guild, said all these items would make great gifts for Christmas or other occasions, because they are one-of-a-kind items that can't be found anywhere else.

They make everything from clothing and household items to jewelry and baskets.

The Weaver's Guild is 22 years old.

The arts center will have another interesting exhibit on display this month. From Monday through Jan. 2, "Through Children's Eyes" will be shown in Gallery B. This is an exhibit of mostly two-dimensional artwork from students in the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district.

"We wanted the kids to have an opportunity to show their work to the public, and this is something we would like to do annually," Suzanne Hale, Gallery Committee member, said.

Teachers from USD 383 got together and selected pieces from the artwork the children worked on in their classes.

Hale said the artists who show their work at the arts center have gone through a process of filling out applications and submitting samples of artwork to the Manhattan Center for the Arts Gallery Committee.

The committee votes on whether the artwork will be displayed at the center.

"Anyone who is interested in showing their art can apply at the art center office. Overall, we try to show local and regional artists' works. When people come to the art center, they are often surprised by the talent right here in Manhattan and the surrounding areas," Hale said.

Students might find it interesting to see the artwork that was made by other students and people around the community.

"We try to maintain a certain level of quality and promote diversity to draw in an audience," Hale said.

The arts center is open from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday and is housed at 1520 Poyntz Ave.

NATO OKs military to begin plans for Bosnia

Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — NATO's military chiefs received their marching orders Monday: Begin planning for a new force of up to 30,000 troops to keep peace in Bosnia while it continues to rebuild.

The North Atlantic Council, the alliance's top policymaking body, told Gen. George Joulwan and his staff at NATO headquarters to create an operations plan for a multinational force half the size of the one sent to Bosnia nearly a year ago.

The mandate for the current force, which at its peak numbered just under 60,000, expires Dec. 20.

The new one will include about 8,500 Americans and may stay on for another 18 months.

There had been a consensus that a military force would be needed in Bosnia well beyond Dec. 20, but NATO couldn't go ahead until the United States announced its decision to participate, which President Clinton did Friday.

The Council had to choose from among four options: total withdrawal, a small deterrence force to prevent an outbreak of fighting, a deterrence-plus force capable of a wider mission and continuation of the present force. No serious consideration was given to the first or last option.

Ambassadors instructed military planners to begin work on the basis of the third option, which includes continuing with the military task of providing a stable environment in Bosnia while providing some support to the civilian reconstruction and reconciliation mission.

However, a smaller force will mean the troops can provide less help to the civilian side headed by former Swedish Prime Minister Carl Bildt.

On Monday, the United States proposed a few suggestions for the new force, including extending the mission to 18 months instead of just one year and reviewing the situation every six months to see if the force could be cut.

The Council meets again Wednesday after ambassadors have considered the American proposals.

than 250 colleges and universities throughout the United States. Although his main focus is on the JFK assassination, he also spends time researching other topics such as civil rights, campaign financing and how corporate control over national media organizations limits political debate.

Harris spent a good part of his presentation discussing Lee Harvey Oswald and a theory that says he was the lone assassin.

"It is a great story," he said, "but if you take the evidence piece by piece, it falls apart."

The rifle, photographs of Oswald, the eye witness, the Single Bullet Theory and the government's involvement with the assassination were some of the items Harris discussed.

"The supposed rifle was a piece of crap," he said. "The trigger was defective, the sight was misaligned, the firing pin was rusted, and there was no proof that it had even been fired. They never tested it."

Oswald, who was in the Marines, had the lowest possible score in the lowest level of marksmanship, Harris said. Fellow Marines said he very rarely even hit the target or the board it was posted on.

The government hired the highest-class gunmen in the National Rifle Association to test the possibility of the shots being fired from the seventh-story window of the Texas Book Depository. They gave them repaired guns, an easier shot and a stationary target, and none of them could do it, Harris said.

"Oswald would've been better off throwing the gun at him," Harris said.

Harris also said there were no fingerprints on the rifle until the day after the assassination, after two FBI agents spent an hour alone with Oswald's dead body in the morgue.

Harris said there are two very famous photographs of Oswald that Harris says have become very useful. The picture shows Oswald standing in front of his house, holding the rifle and two communist newspapers. The photographs were supposedly taken seven months before the assassination, Harris said.

If you look at the shadows, the position of his body, his height, his chin and the difference in his height from picture to picture, it almost proves the pictures are fake, Harris said. Oswald's wife also said she took the pictures from their back porch, but you can see the back porch in the photos.

Another point Harris discussed involved the time of the assassination. Almost anyone asked would say it happened at 1:10 p.m., but Oswald was seen across town at 1:04 p.m. If this is correct, he would have had to run a mile across downtown Dallas, position himself in the seventh-story window and make nine bullet wounds in approximately six minutes.

The assassination time was later moved to 1:16 p.m., Harris said.

Harris also discussed the path of the bullet and how he thinks Oswald would have had to be in the trunk of the car to make the puncture wounds doctors say were there.

CATTLE

Mintert said.

"The good news from a cow-calf operator's perspective is that with the dramatic reduction in corn prices we've seen in roughly the last eight or nine weeks, that's going to have a positive impact on calf prices next year," he said. "So cow-calf operations will probably be selling calves at higher prices a year from now than they are today."

However, this forecast is still contingent on next summer's weather, because farmers still have tight corn stocks.

If Kansas sees another drought, the corn crop will be low and consequently send corn prices skyward again, which would be negative for cattle operations.

If Kansas has normal weather, corn crops will flourish, and the liquidation phase could be cut short, which would mean cow-calf producers would be back in the black by 1998.

"For the typical cow-calf operation in Kansas, I think what happens in the corn belt next summer in terms of weather is going to be very critical — much more critical than normal," Mintert said.

First e-mail harassment case reported

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff reporter

The first case of sexual harassment by computer case at K-State is underway thanks to one student who stood up for what she believes in.

Michelle Cooper, senior in English, creative writing and pre-law, filed a formal complaint against a student who sexually harassed her via computer.

"I would not mind seeing him expelled," Cooper said. "The affirmative action office has done a wonderful job of helping me with my problem."

Cooper said using public computer labs to send pornographic e-mail, sexually harass people on IRC, and view pornography is on the rise across campus. People are beginning to complain and want to see something done about the problem, she said.

"Some people just say hit the delete key. The problem is that is not an option on IRC. Furthermore, once I've seen it, it's too late. Hitting the delete key does not solve the problem," she said.

Dawn Anderson, associate director for affirmative action, said there was no specific policy about sexual harassment by computer, but one is being developed. There is, however, a general policy regarding sexual harassment that should cover all types of sexual harassment.

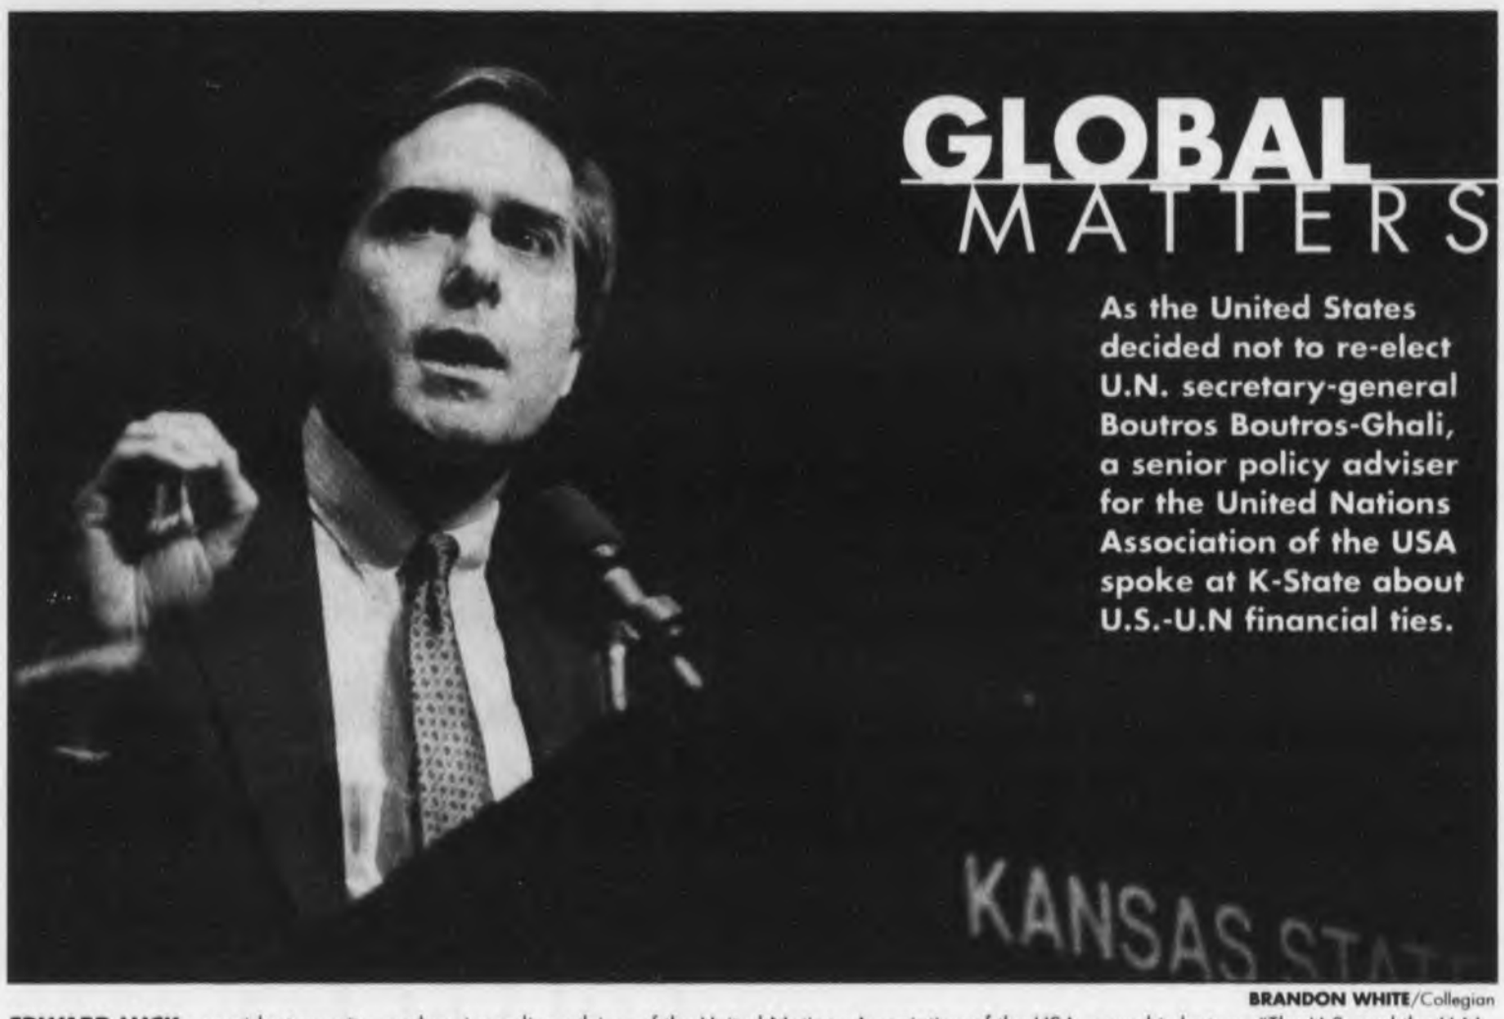
Ivonne Alfonso, senior in advertising and graphic design, got four messages within one hour.

"I was on the Latino channel, and all of a sudden I got a message saying, 'Check this page out,' but I didn't check it out. Then another one said 'free nude sex pictures,' so I sent a message to leave me alone," Alfonso said.

Alfonso also told the sender she did not need to see the pictures, as they were for perverts, like he and his friends were.

She tried to find the person through a command but could not.

After she threatened him, he stopped. Alfonso said she knew there are monitors, and letters will be sent to people if they get caught sending inappropriate messages.



"I think they were K-State students, and they know a lot about computers. They were not on the same channel as me. They wrote to me through a private channel," she said.

Alfonso said she did not think it was a big deal, but it bothered her. If they are from K-State, they can get information about her, and she does not want that to happen.

Inside

The editorial board calls for policies to be constructed for cases dealing with e-mail harassment and asks that these policies be enforced without censorship playing a role.

BRANDON WHITE/Collegian

EDWARD LUCK, president emeritus and senior policy adviser of the United Nations Association of the USA, gave his lecture, "The U.S. and the U.N.: the Odd Couple in an Age of Uncertainty," Tuesday in Forum Hall. The lecture was the final one this year of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series.

U.S. vetoes re-election

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The United States vetoed Boutros Boutros-Ghali for re-election as U.N. secretary-general in a 14-1 vote Tuesday in the Security Council.

Boutros-Ghali refused to withdraw his candidacy despite the veto, setting the stage for a protracted battle in which the United States has so far found itself diplomatically isolated.

"This is just the opening round," U.N. Spokesman Sylvana Foa said. "He's in it until the Security Council makes a final decision."

The Clinton administration offended many key allies in June when it announced it would veto the re-election of the 74-year-old Egyptian diplomat. Senior U.S. officials say replacing Boutros-Ghali is the only way to persuade the Republican-controlled Congress to pay the $1.5 billion that the United States owes the organization.

Africans have insisted that their continent deserves two terms of representation in the post, as has been U.N. tradition. Ten of the 15 council members co-sponsored a resolution calling for Boutros-Ghali's re-election.

Foa quoted Boutros-Ghali as saying he was gratified and really appreciates the overwhelming support shown by the members states of the United Nations.

Foa said a 14-1 show of support "is rather conclusive" in a democratic process, but added: "This is obviously not a democratic process."

Without mentioning the United States, she said the strong support shown Boutros-Ghali should be noted by member states.

U.S. Ambassador Madeleine Albright told the 14 other council members Monday that she had written instructions to veto Boutros-Ghali, saying he has lost the confidence of Congress.

Albright urged African diplomats to come up with an alternate to Boutros-Ghali.

"We have stated over and over again we will give special preference to an African candidate, but it's important for them to come forward with an African candidate," she said.

Ambassador Alfredo Lopes Cabral of Guinea-Bissau said the Africans were standing behind Boutros-Ghali "with all (due) respect for the decision of one country," — meaning the United States.

"We are very pleased with the results," Egyptian Ambassador Nabil Elaraby told reporters. "It proved that the whole world was behind Africa and the candidate Africa chose, which is the current secretary-general."

If the United States sticks by its opposition, the process of selecting a new secretary-general could drag on for weeks. The five permanent members — the United States, China, Russia, France and Britain — hold veto power in the council.

Diplomatic sources said China could veto any candidate put forward by the United States over objections of the Africans. China considers itself an advocate for Africa and other developing countries.

In an effort to appease the Africans, the United States has agreed to a selection formula weighted in favor of African candidates. The formula calls for limiting the second round of voting to African candidates once Boutros-Ghali is vetoed.

But diplomats said it was unlikely any alternative African candidate could win substantial support as long as Boutros-Ghali remains an active candidate.

Security Council President Nugroho Wisnumurti of Indonesia said he would ask African ambassadors to submit names of alternative African candidates before scheduling another vote. He said there was nothing to preclude the Africans from trying again for Boutros-Ghali.

Ambassador Roble Olhaye of Djibouti said the Africans would meet later today to decide what to do in the wake of the American veto. "We have to consult among ourselves, and we have to report to our countries," he said, indicating the process could take days.

Wisnumurti said he hoped the Africans would submit other names soon because "indeed the process has gained momentum and I believe that we should maintain the momentum to give a good impression of the process itself."

There is no precedent establishing what should happen if the issue remains unresolved after Dec. 31, when Boutros-Ghali's first five-year term expires.

On two occasions, vetoes have gone the distance. Russia vetoed the re-election of the first secretary-general, Trygve Lie of Norway. The council was deadlocked in a series of vetoes and counter-vetoes.

Finally, under U.S. pressure, the council reported to the General Assembly it was deadlocked. The assembly then extended Lie's term for three years.

Soviets did not recognize Lie's extended authority, and he resigned after two years.

China also vetoed a third term for Kurt Waldheim.

Speaker examines U.N.-U.S. expenditures

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

One-tenth of 1 percent of the U.S. budget goes toward its share of the United Nations expenses, Edward Luck, president emeritus and senior policy adviser for the United Nations Association of the USA, said.

The U.S. piece of the pie costs $1.5 billion. That breaks down to a mere $6 for each American to enjoy the benefits of an association with the United Nations.

"This is not a big price for the world's wealthiest country," he said. "We pay one-fourth of the budget, leaving the other three-fourths to the rest of the world."

Luck delivered the final lecture for this year in the Lou Douglas Lecture Series Tuesday evening in Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union. His lecture, titled "The U.S. and the U.N.: the Odd Couple in an Age of Uncertainty," drew a fairly large crowd.

Luck said there is a dilemma between the United Nations and its most prominent member. The two might not always have a smooth relationship, but he said hopes it will be a productive one. From its earliest days, the relationship was troubled, he said.

Funding amendment fails to pass in Senate

city/government editor

Student Senate decided Tuesday night not to give away power.

Chris Avila, graduate senator, proposed an amendment to the Student Governing Association constitution giving final interpretation of funding regulations to the Allocations Committee chair and taking it away from the Senate, the Senate chair and the judicial branch's tribunal.

The amendment failed 2-44-1.

Avila said he hoped the proposal would eliminate some of the disagreements regarding interpretations that have occurred this semester and in past semesters.

"This gives the authority to the Student Senate allocations chair," Avila said. "That person has gone through a screening process, and that person should have the power to decide what's good and what's bad."

Avila was the allocations chairman last year.

This year's allocations chairman, Bret Glendening, didn't want that much power for himself or his successors.

"Allowing a group to come in here and to allow Senate to question why we're giving money to them is an important function of this body," Glendening said.

He said the process was cumbersome but necessary.

Other members of Senate thought the amendment was undemocratic.

"With powers like Senate's comes checks and balances," Bill Muir, faculty representative, said. "To give supreme power to an appointed committee chair is beyond reasonability."

After defeating the amendment, Senate heard first readings, including one that would change the number of senators elected next semester.

Because enrollment is expected to increase in the next few years, and because the new linear fee system has changed students' enrollment statuses, the Senate Operations Committee introduced a bill which would give colleges one senator for each 400 students enrolled, instead of each 300.

This would bring the number of senators from 61 to about 45 next year.

"If we don't pass the legislation, what we'll be looking at in a few years is about 80 senators, which by any standard will be difficult to deal with," Sam Halabi, Senate Operations chair, said.

Fitzwater to deliver 108th Landon Lecture

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

Although the Landon Lecture series has spanned 30 years and has included 107 speeches, one K-State alumnus has never given a lecture.

This will change Thursday when Marlin Fitzwater delivers the 108th Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. in McCain Auditorium. Fitzwater was press secretary for presidents Reagan and Bush, and is author of the best-selling book, "Call the Briefing," an account of his 10 years in the White House.

FYI

Marlin Fitzwater will sign copies of "Call the Briefing!" from 2 to 3 p.m. Thursday in the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

For Fitzwater, the trip back to his alma mater is a special one.

"I'm honored to be able to go back to the University and say thank you," he said. "K-State really opened my eyes to the world."

Among the eye-opening experiences for Fitzwater, who graduated in 1965 and majored in technical journalism, were being publicity chairman for Delta Tau Delta, working for the Collegian and serving as president of Sigma Delta Chi.

"Being a member of Sigma Delta Chi was wonderful," he said. "It gave me fraternal experience with other people in the school."

Working for the Collegian was also rewarding for Fitzwater, who said he entered K-State knowing he wanted to be a journalist.

"During my first year at K-State, I sold ads for the Collegian," he said. "I also worked on the general reporting staff and the sports section.

"The Collegian not only gave me a chance to learn, but also helped pay for my education," he said. Fitzwater was paid $35 a month to work on the Collegian.

But the Collegian was just one step on Fitzwater's career path. While at K-State, he also wrote for the Topeka Capital-Journal and the Manhattan Mercury.

After moving to Washington, D.C., and working for several federal agencies, Fitzwater served as deputy press secretary for President Reagan from 1983 to 1985. He then served as spokesman for Vice President Bush until January 1987, when he was appointed

Professor's fund might help student

AMY LAGRONE
staff reporter

Tragedies can often create unexpected bonds between people.

This is the case with William Dawes, professor in electrical engineering, and Elma Bratovic, senior in architectural engineering.

Dawes was recuperating at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota after having a brain tumor removed when he met one of his students. Bratovic had recently been admitted to the clinic for the same reason.

Bratovic's tumor is scheduled to be removed Nov. 22 at the Mayo Clinic. The family has already been confronted with a bill for $3,000, and more costs are expected to arrive. The operation will cost more than $100,000.

A trust fund created by Dawes has been developed for Bratovic in hopes the family will receive some financial aid before it is too late. In addition to her own medical concerns, Bratovic has a 16-month-old child to take care of.

Dawes is slowly recuperating and is scheduled to return to Manhattan by the first of the year. Shawn Brougham, a friend of Dawes, said Dawes is having trouble speaking and walking.

"They told him he would never lecture again," Brougham said. "He is a great loss to K-State."

Brougham, through Dawes, has also developed a friendship with the Bratovic family. He said the family is having a tough time emotionally and financially.

Bratovic came to the United States in 1991 as a high-school exchange student from Bosnia. Due to the outbreak of civil war there, she was unable to return to her homeland.

Bratovic's mother, Spomenka Bratovic, and sister, Lejla Bratovic, fled in 1992. Her father, Bato Bratovic, escaped two years later.

Her father, although intelligent and gifted in the arts, has been forced to work as a janitor until he is able to master the English language.

Elma Bratovic's mother has received her masters degree from K-State in French and has worked in the Office of International Programs. Her sister is a freshman in arts and sciences at K-State.

Despite high levels of education, the family needs help.

Brougham also said Elma Bratovic and Dawes have become great friends by supporting each other. It has gone beyond teacher and student.

"He has been an inspiration to them," Brougham said. "Bill Dawes is one of the greatest people in Manhattan, he will do whatever you ask him to."

Bill Richter, friend of the Bratovic family and professor of international programming, said this fund is important.

"Here is a fellow student who has suffered a severe amount of tragedy in her life," he said, "and there is opportunity for us to help."

Donations can be sent to Security National Bank of Manhattan for the Elma Bratovic Benevolence Fund, 800 Poyntz Ave., Manhattan, KS 66502.

Rape in city reported

CHARLE SIOUIX CHARLETON
staff writer

Early Sunday morning, a K-State student reported being raped to the Riley County Police Department, Lt. Herb Crosby, RCPD investigator, said.

The 18-year-old woman attended a party off-campus, in the south-central part of Manhattan, with some friends. She became separated from her friends.

A man, unknown to her, offered to help her find them. He then led her down to the basement of the multi-residence building and attacked her, Crosby said.

After the attack, the woman went to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue, where physical evidence was collected.

The matter is being investigated, and police are seeking witnesses, Crosby said.

NATION WORLD

• ACCUSED CIA OFFICER SOLD SECRET RECORDS. The final piece of evidence against Harold James Nicholson came into focus for CIA spy catchers on Nov. 12. Concealed cameras in his CIA office caught him kneeling under his desk photographing secret documents. Nicholson, 46, of Burke, Va., is the highest-ranking CIA officer to face espionage charges. The FBI suspects he sold the names of all new CIA agent trainees in the past two years, a breach of security that could jeopardize lives.

• TEXACO EXECUTIVE CHARGED WITH OBSTRUCTION. The former Texaco official whose tape-recording showed executives using racial insults and plotting to destroy documents was charged today with obstruction of justice. In a complaint unsealed at federal court, an FBI agent said Richard Lundwall and other unidentified Texaco officials had tampered with documents at the crux of the civil race discrimination lawsuit against the oil company. The case was settled last week at a cost of $176.1 million, making it the largest settlement ever of a racial discrimination lawsuit.

• KACZYNSKI AGREES TO VIDEO ARRAIGNMENT. Unabomber defendant Theodore J. Kaczynski, jailed in Sacramento, Calif., has agreed to be arraigned via video hookup Dec. 10 on charges of murdering an advertising executive in New Jersey with a mail bomb.

• CHUNNEL BLAZE. A fire Monday night was the first serious accident since the 31-mile tunnel linking Britain and France opened two years ago. Service was halted and could take three weeks to be fully restored. Eight people, including a pregnant woman, were overcome by the thick black smoke.

• POPE ACCEPTS CASTRO'S INVITATION TO VISIT CUBA. Fidel Castro won a long-sought pledge Tuesday from Pope John Paul II to visit Communist Cuba next year. But, as the Vatican made clear, the pope accepted the invitation only after Castro agreed to the usual conditions for papal trips — that the pope can travel anywhere and meet with anyone. The Cuban leader had hoped to restrict the pope's visit, and may have paid a risky price for papal recognition. Cuba is the only Latin American country the pope has yet to visit.

• BOSNIAN SERB COMMANDER REFUSES TO STEP DOWN. Gen. Ratko Mladic, indicted for war crimes, still refuses to step down as military commander, his aides said Tuesday, despite claims by the Bosnian Serb president that he has agreed to give up power.

CAMPUS

• CROP ARTIST TO DISCUSS RECENT PROJECTS. Stan Herd, a crop artist, is speaking at 3:30 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Little Theatre. Herd is visiting K-State through the College of Architecture Planning and Design, and he will probably discuss some of his most recent projects.

• POETRY READING. Jonathan Holden, professor of English, will give a poetry reading at 7 p.m. today at the Manhattan Center for the Arts. This will benefit the center.

• SCHURLE RECEIVES AWARD FOR TEACHING. Bryan Schurle, professor of agricultural economics, has received the Excellence in College and University Teaching in the Food and Agricultural Sciences Award. The award is sponsored by the United States Department of Agriculture and the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges. The award includes a stipend $2,000 to be used by the recipient for the improvement of teaching at his college or university.

SPORTS

• BELLE JOINS CHICAGO WHITE SOX. Albert Belle joined the Chicago White Sox today and agreed to a five-year contract expected to make him baseball's highest-paid player. The contract was thought to be worth $52.5 million during five years, which would be baseballs richest in both total package and average annual value.

• WILLIAMS TO COACH BOSTON RED SOX. Jimy Williams, the third base coach for the Atlanta Braves and a former Toronto Blue Jays manager, was hired Tuesday as manager of the Boston Red Sox. He would inherit a team in turmoil that finished with an 85-77 record, third in the AL East. Williams, 53, had succeeded Bobby Cox as manager of Toronto in 1986. He was dismissed early in the 1989 season, compiling a 281-241 overall record.

• GREEN BAY CORNERBACK SENTENCED. Tyrone Williams of the Green Bay Packers was sentenced Tuesday to six months in jail for a 1994 car shooting that happened while he was at the University of Nebraska. The 23-year-old rookie cornerback showed no emotion in the courtroom and declined to comment. Williams also must serve three years of supervised probation and perform 400 hours of unpaid community service in the next 36 months.

KSDB-91.9 airs local rock sounds on Fridays

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

Ultimate Fake Book. El Fontain. Jiffy Boy. These are just a few of the local bands that can be heard from 4 to 5 p.m. Fridays during Local Spotlight on KSDB-FM 91.9.

"Local Spotlight" is a weekly show on K-State's student radio station, DB92. Cara Hollandsworth and James Hansen are the hosts of the show. It features music by local and regional acts, but this is not the place to hear music by bands that appear on MTV.

"We want to get the music of the lesser-known bands out to the people," Hollandsworth said.

"We just play local music, and it's a good way to let people know what's around here," Hansen said.

"Local Spotlight" is different from "Slice of the Homegrown," another local music show which airs on KMKF-FM 101.5 "Local Spotlight" plays host to a variety of bands each week.

"Steve Anthony, on Slice of the Homegrown, only plays one band, but since we have a whole hour, we try to do a little of everything," Hollandsworth said.

She said occasionally the show features more music by one band on different occasions, such as with the Truck Stop Love and El Fontain breakups.

Hollandsworth said "Local Spotlight" now reports to Pitch Weekly on its top bands.

Hansen said Hollandsworth compiles the list and faxes it to Pitch Weekly for Pitch Weekly's top 10 list of local bands.

Hollandsworth said she hopes by doing the show they can increase the awareness of the local music scene and generate more interest in it.

When promoters go to arrange shows, they look at things such as attendance at other local shows, she said.

"There are good bands in the region that you can actually see live," Hansen said.

She said although Lawrence has a really good music scene, it also has a number of not-so-great bands, and in comparison, Manhattan has a better percentage of quality bands.

"We have really great bands here," she said.

Hollandsworth and Hansen get the music they play from various sources. Some of it comes into the station to the music directors. Hollandsworth said the station also solicits music from some of the bands after their shows. Other times, she said, bands will send their recordings directly to them.

Hollandsworth said she thinks DB92 gets a lot of phone calls on the show, and people are supportive of the local music scene.

"That's where it starts — where you hear the local music," she said.

Applications due for DJ positions

AMY LAGRONE
staff reporter

If you have ever wanted to be a radio disc jockey, now's your chance.

KSDB-FM 91.9, K-State's student-operated radio station, has a variety of opportunities available to those students who want to volunteer their time.

DB92 is looking for 40 DJs, 25 newscasters and 17 sportscasters. The students are required to have energy, enthusiasm and a positive attitude.

"I always try to find people that have professional attitudes," Joe Montgomery, station manager, said.

Montgomery has recently put applications for DJ positions outside his office in McCain 317. Everyone is welcome to apply. Applicants must fill out the application and turn in a tape of a sample broadcast. The tape is used to hear the applicant's voice, enunciation and energetic tone.

"The most important thing is how they represent themselves," Montgomery said. "You can improve speaking skills over time."

Bernie Haney, senior in electronic journalism and DB92 sports director, said he wants people from different majors, not just mass communications.

"You don't have to have a lot of time or talent to do sports," he said. "You just need to be willing to get here on time and have fun."

Commission OKs purchase of site for business park

SCOTT CONNER
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission unanimously approved the purchase of about 190 acres of land that will be used for the development of a business park.

The proposed site is west of the Manhattan Airport on Wildcat Creek Road.

In his proposal to the commission Tuesday night, City Manager Gary Greer said the park is needed because Manhattan's current industrial park has one small parcel of land left that has not been sold by the city.

"I have really exhausted the situation, and I have tried to research and to look into what we needed and what we could do at this time," Greer said about his and city administration's efforts into selecting the sight for the new park.

Greer said the idea of a new business park has been researched during the last six years. Research culminated in the recommendation of a best-possible site for the new park.

"The proposal that you have before you tonight is what I believe and what staff believes is the best possible proposal to the community for the purpose of buying property for the business park," said Greer.

According to the proposal, the land will be purchased from three different landowners for about $975,000.

The project will be funded by cash reserves that past city commissions have already set aside for the purpose of industrial development.

Commissioner Steve Hall said he supported the plan, because it could be paid by the city in cash; the inventory of the current industrial park is known; the proposal was researched in an organized matter; and he was impressed by the personal integrity of the city manager in his research into the matter.

Before passing the proposal, the commission addressed questions from concerned property owners in the area who said they were upset about the lack of communication from city administration to property owners in the area.

Manhattan resident Ed Hansa said he was concerned about the fact city administration had not contacted him when it was researching the property for the park.

"Not one of the property owners, other than these three in this package, out of all the adjacent property owners — not one of them has been talked to, consulted, nothing," he said.

Hansa said he and other landowners in the area were concerned about how the commission would regulate zoning, the

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

University administrators need to establish sexual harassment policy for e-mail users

As society increasingly depends on technology, it follows that many of society's problems will find themselves in technological incarnations.

WHY WE CARE

With the explosion of new technology, the Internet and e-mail as forms of communication comes the problem of cyber harassment.

Such is the case with sexual harassment at K-State.

This cyber harassment can exist as either explicit or suggestive e-mail, suggestive conversations on the Internet Relay Channel, or the downloading of pornographic material on the World Wide Web at campus computer labs.

Under the Constitution, one can still say whatever one wants as long as it doesn't infringe on someone else's liberties. Sexual harassment is just that — an unsolicited advance, whether verbal, physical or electronic.

This problem isn't special to K-State; it occurs in offices and universities throughout the world. And the one thing in common with every case is the authorities don't understand the issue or how to assess it.

How can we deal with this unchartered territory? Harassment over the Internet should be treated as if it were verbal or physical — either way, all forms make an unwilling recipient uncomfortable.

Unfortunately, the University has not developed a comprehensive policy with which to deal with the problems.

To begin, the University should solicit feedback from students to determine proper comfort levels. E-mail harassment should be easier to determine, since the harasser leaves a paper trail.

As of now, K-State computer administrators have the privilege of reading your e-mail if they think you might be misusing your account. If cyber harassment proliferates at K-State, it will only give these administrators more reasons to demean our privacy.

Eventually, this policy could be taken out-of-hand and become a way for the administration to censor your mail. No one wants this to happen.

If you've been harassed electronically, your first and easiest option is to reply to the harasser and let them know you have been offended.

By self-policing your e-mail, you can let people know your own comfort levels and perhaps stop the harassment from occurring.

The advance of technology, specifically the Internet, has radically altered the ways in which we live. However, some things like personal well-being and comfort don't change.

Where have all the hippies gone?

Idealism of the '60s lost; problems, hypocricy still there

MY

Page
GETZ

I don't know what house the moon's in or what kind of choreography the planets are following these days, but I feel a revolution coming on.

Maybe it's just wishful thinking, but the more people who lose the limbo with the poverty line and the more concentrated on blame this nation becomes, the shift in our karmic climate warps our paths like Siamese pretzels. This forces us to live closer together as the economic gap between us increases, a standard recipe for revolution.

This fringe air was intensified by the chilling aftershocks of seeing "Hair." It tugged at the complacency nurtured by my preoccupation with the internal rivaling of my academic and financial survival.

I stumbled upon the ideology of the 1960s a few decades late. I would listen to Peter, Paul and Mary singing "Where have all the flowers gone," and I would sing "Where have all the hippies gone?"

But I was young. I still thought Lava Lamps really had lava in them and rich people talked on cellulite phones.

I lost faith in the idealism of the Age of Aquarius when drugs upstaged the cause.

I've always wondered how such a social conscience and activism thrived among the distractions of drugs.

Marijuana made it difficult for me to operate a remote control, much less organize a mass protest.

And the people I used to do a lot of acid with preferred Nintendo to Sanskrit; quoted Monty Python, not Jerry Rubin; and would rather set fire to cockroaches than burn bras.

Not exemplary behavior for a revolutionary.

Where have all the hippies gone?

I found quite a few hibernating in drug rehabs and coming down in 12-step meetings.

When I think of reform I think of an equalizing utopian movement that wouldn't disrupt the distribution of resources but completely banish capitalism in all its genocidal classism.

But the only reform I hear about is welfare reform. What a concept — let's immobilize the most vulnerable fraction of society.

I'm picturing the urgency of the reluctant revolution of the 1990s, the replacement of the Apologist Manifesto of the 1980s' bleeding heart moderation.

I hear liberals being criticized for being too radical, and I'm thinking even the radicals seem too conservative to me.

My revolution, based on a completely unrealistic human race where people aren't afraid of each other and the fundamental kindness at the core of every religion is enforced voluntarily, would have to eliminate certain obstacles.

The first offender to be done away with, of course, is capitalism.

Then the socializing choke hold of sexism, racism, heterosexism and religious intolerance would be addressed through the division of society into small communal cities based on barter which could also trade with other communes.

The trick to the game is that everyone would contribute because everyone would benefit, and in a completely localized socialist democracy, true representative government could be organized.

We dismiss this kind of idealism as unrealistic, and in the process enable inequality to warp our education systems, force us to sell our dreams for security and alienate our brothers and sisters because there aren't enough table scraps to go around.

One percent of the population of this country owns more wealth than the bottom 90 percent of the population combined.

That means that the wealthiest 2 million people make as much money in this country as the lowest 200 million people combined.

But we watch "Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous," buy lottery tickets and fret over government hand outs to those we believe don't earn the right to be helped, even if that help still keeps them below poverty level.

What do the top 1 percent have that we don't have? Nine times out of 10 they are born into unwarranted wealth. They don't work any harder than the rest of us, in fact in most cases, their privilege buys them the right to work less.

But collective blame doesn't target those who purchase million dollar summer homes to use for tax write-offs.

We blame those who make less money per week than many spend on a business lunch.

Yet the election platforms didn't address this inequality. Instead it emphasized those who have the least, casualties of unwarranted poverty.

They didn't mention it, because they benefit from it.

Why would their platforms attack the wealth that pays for that platform?

Capitalism kills.

Capitalism kills because poverty kills.

The competitive market is designed to render a portion of the population disposable. We wonder why there are so many living in poverty, millions of homeless people, and why THOSE people don't just "buck up, pull themselves up by their boot straps and try harder."

The truth is, our system requires the exploitation of people to do the dirty work and still remain scapegoats.

This nation ruled by immigrants blames new immigrants for taking OUR jobs, but when these employers can't find enough cheap labor here, OUR jobs move to cheaper nations.

We fight for jobs that barely contribute to our survival, and are baited against each other for the leftovers of resources picked over by white men's old money.

We're left pointing fingers at ourselves and each other while the hierarchal web remains the invisible oppressor, selling hope through token policies.

We're told that we can't trust each other to live in a socialist democracy, but is there really such thing as democratic capitalism?

My revolution, based on a completely unrealistic human race where people aren't afraid of each other and the fundamental kindness at the core of every religion is enforced voluntarily, would have to eliminate certain obstacles.

More thought should go into where we rest our behinds

MY

Russell
FORTMEYER

The importance of good design is oft overlooked in our daily rush to complete appointments and responsibilities. That's a low-level, cliché way of saying life in the fast lane precludes attention to detail.

This thought came to mind while standing at Auntie Mae's Parlor Friday night listening to the colorful band Wasted Potential roar through a set. The fact we were standing seemed to bother my friends.

Somehow we began a conversation on comfortable chairs on campus. Which logically follows into a conversation of enticing spaces on campus. Architectural space, which I discussed in a series of commentaries last year (see the Electronic Collegian archives for the week of March 18), is an important aspect of emotional and physical comfort, but one could consider simple chair design much more important to a college student.

Being forced into a small cinder-block and lay-in ceiling classroom doesn't encourage much of a response, so our thoughts and feelings are focused toward either the lecture and the chalkboard or the immediate environment.

Suddenly, a foreign object laying on the floor becomes a surrealist sculpture. New attention is given to what a person is wearing. And, to the point of this column, the accouterments of the chair in which one is sitting become of utmost importance. If anything, it sounds a bit far-fetched.

Whether people consciously realizes they are analyzing their environment in this manner isn't the point. In a round-about way, good design of classroom seating should provide the user no reason to consciously analyze it. The chair should be natural — in both feel and design.

This is mostly the case on campus, since many of our classrooms are filled with conventional wood chairs which roughly evoke a Quaker tradition even if the desk-top is attached.

Conversely, in the situation, such as a lobby or hall seating arrangement, where the act of being seated is the prime purpose for the user, the chair should formally and functionally respond to the user. In this manner, the chair can affect the user in a positive or negative way.

The wooden benches in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art are splendid pieces of woodwork, but when in use inform the user: You can sit, but don't get comfortable.

In Paslay Lecture Hall, in Durland Hall, the lecture is interrupted on more than one occasion by the squeaky, permanently rotating chairs that insist on pushing one into the table.

During a tour at the Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles, one is temporarily seated on a concrete stump to view a film on the Jewish Holocaust. The cold, rigid concrete serves a greater purpose than simply the function of providing a seat.

Unfortunately (Gee, I've overused that word this year), many of our campus chairs do not aspire to anything more than offering the most basic function.

With the exception of the sleepy dreamland that is the Cat's Pause lounge on the second floor of the K-State Student Union and a random department chair, most of the chairs on campus provide the most basic utilitary function, with little regard for formal design.

The Cat's Pause is an example of how a comfortably interesting chair creates a used space, even if the space is visually uninteresting. Imagine the visitors to the Pause finding wooden benches. Would it be used as much?

In the case of the Farrell Library expansion, the budget has been so tight down to the last wire that furniture design plays a secondary role. One must be willing to pay for a chair before debating the merits of design.

As is primarily the case, the design of a chair is based on a balance between its form and function. A good chair would hopefully manage both well.

The great architect Gerrit Rietveld, though a designer of buildings, is most notably remembered for his Red/Blue Chair — a simple geometric construction that is both formally fascinating and functionally comfortable.

Rietveld's concerns rest with just our subject of consciousness on the part of the user: "The fact that I am constantly concerned with this extraordinary idea of the awakening of consciousness, may account for my work to be inevitably oriented toward spatial problems.

"Scaling of undefined space to human proportions may be achieved by a line drawn on a road, a floor, a wall, a covering surface, and a combination of vertical and horizontal planes, curved or flat, transparent or massive. It is never a partitioning or closing off, but always a defining element of what is here and there, above and below, between and around."

“Architectural space is an important aspect of emotional and physical comfort, but one could consider simple chair design much more important to a college student.”

K-State's Open House is a chance to see the interior architecture department exhibit, which usually entails a few chair designs and has included a Red/Blue Chair.

What is most obvious in this chair, and the others built by students, is a careful regard was given to the many environmental factors involved in sitting.

As I'm too-often reminded on campus, and in the Collegian newsroom, a good chair is a rare chair.

Russell Fortmeyer is a senior in architectural engineering. When he's not frantically searching for a good chair on campus, you can reach him at (rmf@ksu.edu).

JumboTron takes away from tradition

Editor,

Tradition? JumboTron? Did we really look at a way of achieving tradition with a JumboTron? While at the amazing K-State-KU game, I saw more pride than at most of our home games. The band was playing nonstop. You almost got sick of the fight song. Don't get me wrong, I love watching the instant replays and seeing the statistics, but I don't think we should feel more pride at an opponent's stadium. I think we should reduce the amount of ads and give the band more playing time. We have a decision, do we want to watch television or build tradition?

Writer oversimplified art museum situation

Editor,

I am writing in reference to Russell Fortmeyer's Nov. 18 article, "Valuable Campus Art Lost in the Twilight Zone." Fortmeyer's article is, in the main, quite accurate. However, there are several issues which need to be clarified.

First, there have been many works of art given to the University's colleges and departments over the years. Many of these gifts were given simply for display and enjoyment by the faculty and staff. These items do not belong to the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and no attempt has been made for the art museum to acquire them.

Second, the Beach museum has an acquisition policy that clearly defines the procedures and guidelines for accepting works of art into the collection. There is also an Acquisitions Committee which oversees this process.

With respect to Mitsugi Ohno's glass sculptures, they have not yet been formally offered to the art museum nor accepted by the Acquisitions Committee. The art museum staff will be working with Ohno in the near future to see if he wishes to donate these sculptures to the art museum. If so, then we will follow our procedure which involves his signing a formal donor declaration and its acceptance by the Acquisitions Committee.

In short, the situation is more complex than it appeared in Fortmeyer's article; and we are addressing the concerns that he raises.

Wheel locks are barbaric; they add more fees to already-broke students

Editor,

Last week as class adjourned, I was headed to my truck in the K-State Student Union parking lot to make my usual drive to work in Junction City. Little did I know that I would spend the next hour and a half in Edwards Hall with those parking vultures.

As I arrived at my truck, I noticed the big, bold, embarrassing orange sticker on my driver-side window. A wheel lock had been placed on my truck. "A wheel lock?" I thought. "I know I still have time on the meter!" As I proceeded to check the meter, I was indeed correct.

As many of you know, Parking Services is not in Burt Hall anymore. Now you have to find a ride to fix the problem. This just made me more furious. As I made my way to Edwards Hall, the anger inside started to boil. I am a poor college student trying to do the right thing, and because I don't have any money, they charge me $50 in fines and make me half an hour late for work.

When I arrived, my rage was visible. I spoke my opinion, but no one seemed to listen. I was a single student trying to have an effect. As I became more angered, a police officer tried to calm me down. As I explained my side of the story, he seemed to support me. As a matter of fact, he told me why they had glass up protecting the workers at Burt Hall.

He said that someone once came into Burt Hall with a pipe and destroyed the place because a wheel lock had been placed on his vehicle. He told me a story about how a parking-lot worker got beat up in Aggieville one night because he had been spotted putting a wheel lock on someone's vehicle.

While I think that these actions are brutal and wrong, I also think it is barbaric and wrong for the University to put a wheel lock on our vehicles. I also believe that it is wrong to charge students an additional $50 fine for not having the money to pay their original fines. Let them put a hold on our transcripts or our diploma. Don't let us enroll. But wheel locks with $50 fines should not be allowed. This is an issue that won't go away until policies are changed, and I think that we are all ready for the policies to change.

Homecoming body building contest brings about safety, academic issues

Editor,

I have a question for the fraternities and sororities at K-State. Is the body building contest worth it? I spent four years in a sorority and have yet to see the purpose of the competition. Although a sense of school spirit and team unity usually accompany this competition, here are a few negatives that pop out in my mind every time I think of this event.

First, it is very dangerous. I understand that precautions are taken and safety issues are covered before you even begin practicing. But accidents happen. Knees have been blown out, wrists and ankles have been broken, and people have ended up in the hospital.

Second, the amount of time necessary to prepare for this event is absurd. Teams will practice for two months, three to four nights a week, two to three hours a night. That amounts to 48-96 hours spent on a five-minute routine.

What about academics? As I recall, we are at this University for a reason. Should your grade point average be compromised for a five-minute routine? Last thing I knew, we already had K-State cheerleaders. Why are we trying to learn what they already know how to do?

Finally, body building gives rise to the elitist image of the greek system. Granted, independents are not excluded from this event, but they are not required to participate either. The result being a very noticeable difference in the magnitude of the routines. This difference can make groups seem less important.

This is in no way to belittle the efforts by any organization, but it seems that there can be a more positive use of our resources.

So is it worth the time? The money? The pain? The negative image? For five minutes?

I never thought so.

'Tis the season for Cats for Cans donations

Editor,

This holiday season is, once again, an opportunity to reach out in the spirit of caring and sharing to bless those in our community who might be less fortunate.

I have been very happy over the years to be involved with the Mayor's Holiday Tree Food Drive and the Flint Hills Breadbasket. Each year, I have assisted the K-State campus effort to raise food in a food drive called Cats for Cans.

I have been so proud of the K-State community and the way it has responded to the community need. Last year, for instance, close to 50,000 pounds of food were raised here at K-State. And, this year, we are already approaching that total.

One of the things I so cherish about this special food drive is the way it brings our campus and community together in a way that blesses us all. I encourage each and every one of you to become involved in some way with our Mayor's Holiday Tree Food Drive. Your donation of food or funds will bless many families in our community and make the holidays a little brighter for us all.

Insurance should not be a requirement

Editor,

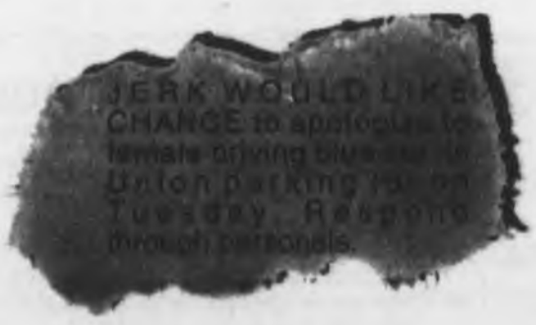
I'm concerned with the possibility of a mandatory insurance plan for all incoming college freshmen. When I talked to one of the Student Health Advisory Committee members two weeks ago, I was impressed to see that they were talking to the students.

I was told the decision was not in SHAC's hands, and it was serving as an advisory adjunct to the administrative committee that will make the decision. I was also told that many of the students whom they had talked to were opposed to the idea.

It struck me as a curiosity to read it now sounds like SHAC has decided the proposal is a good idea.

Had they already made up their minds as to what was best for the students before they received any student input? Has the committee discussion taken into account what the students are telling them, and are they conveying this to the administration?

It seems to me people would have the right to choose not only among providers but to buy insurance at all. I must confess, I like the idea of making insurance more affordable for those of us who otherwise couldn't afford it, but I don't think the benefit of cheap insurance to some of us justifies a repeal of every student's right to decide whether to buy insurance.



Maybe the administration should be looking for other ways to make coverage affordable to those who want it and impress upon others the risks they take by not carrying insurance and then let the student decide.

Eaker readies himself for spotlight of senior leadership responsibilty

With the dawn of Wildcat basketball just around the corner, only one real thing is certain about what is to come from the new season.

Senior center Gerald Eaker, the only senior on the team, will be looked upon to provide leadership for the young squad.

Coach Tom Asbury said in Tuesday's press conference that Eaker is very capable of taking care of the task set forth to him.

"Gerald has a lot more strength, conditioning and stamina than he had last year," Asbury said. "He's not going to be content to stay in the background again this year."

Eaker is more than happy to except the role for two reasons. No. 1, he is having thoughts about playing at the next level, and No. 2 a successful season this year will also help bring this year's young K-State team along quicker.

> "(Eaker) is not going to be content to stay in the background again this year."
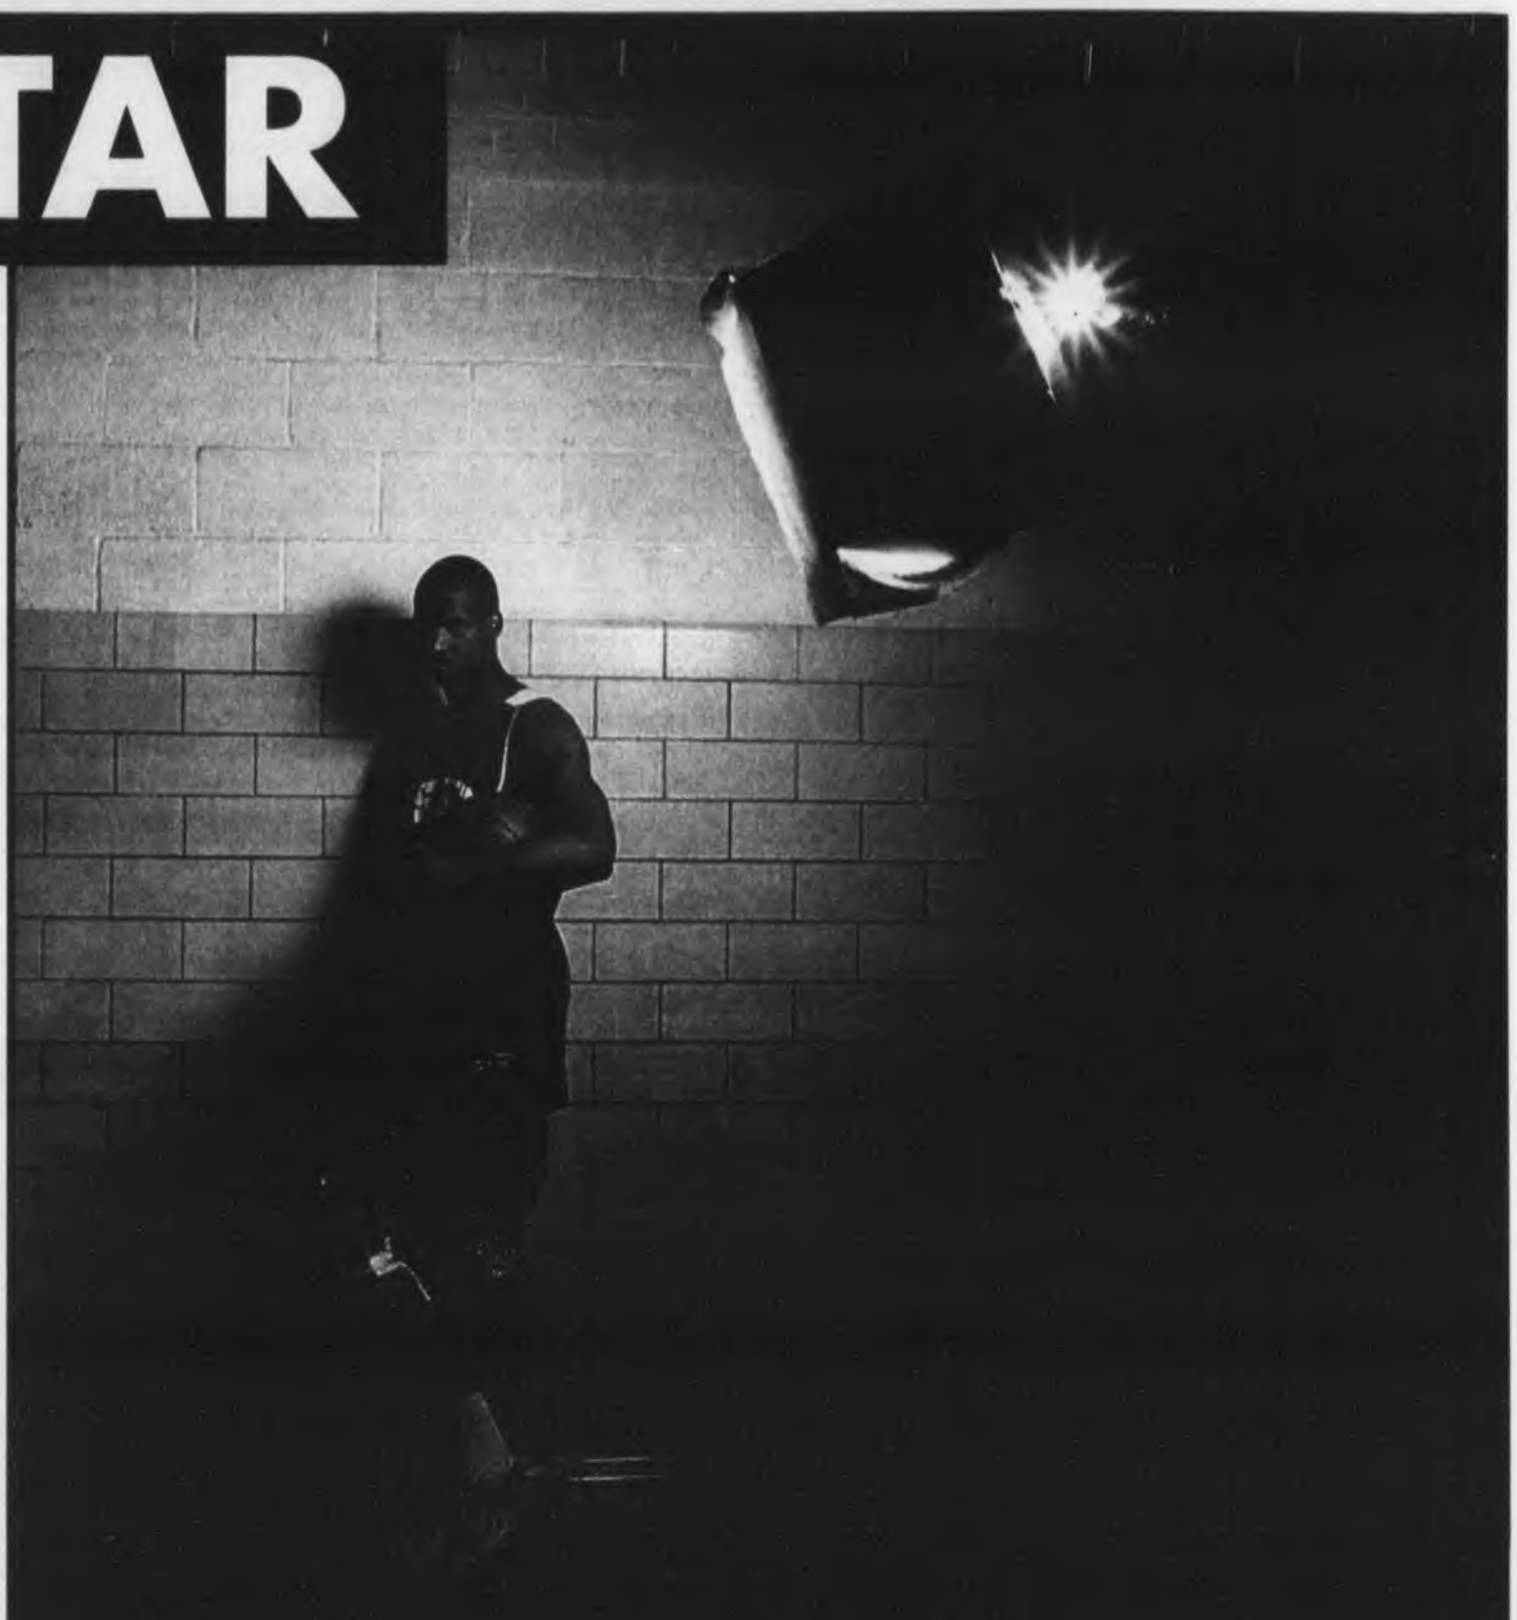
> • TOM ASBURY
> BASKETBALL COACH

"Last year, I was a small part of the team," Eaker said.

"This year I have a bigger role. We have a lot of people who are young and don't have a lot of experience. I've been around college basketball for five years and I know how things go on and off the court," he said.

On the court, Eaker will be expected to provide tough defense inside, along with a scoring attack. Eaker said he doesn't have any set numbers he wants to put up on offense.

"I'm not sure about how many points I will score," Eaker said.



"I want to get four or five blocks a game and I will be a lot more active on the court this year," he said.

Eaker worked hard over the summer in a league with credible NBA players like Chicago Bulls star Juwan Howard, who taught him how to score on offense.

"It gave me the opportunity to play with some great big players," Eaker said. "It taught me a lot about how to score and play defense against big guys."

The Cats and Eaker will start things Friday night at 8 p.m. against the University of Missouri-Kansas City. UMKC shouldn't provide much of a challenge for K-State as much of their non-conference schedule, with names like Morgan State and Coppin State on the billing. Eaker said the games like Friday's against UMKC and the other's might not be bad for the Wildcats.

"I think coach (Asbury) has the right mind with the schedule," Eaker said. "I'm not saying our schedule is weak, but I think it's good for our young team to get some experience against some not-so-tough competition. We have a tough conference and we're going to need some experience when we start up Big 12 play against Kansas."

Homecoming game ends an era

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

This weeks final home football game is not just a Homecoming for many K-State alumni, but the senior class will be shooting for a fourth-consecutive season with nine victories after qualifying for its fourth bowl appearance.

The seventeen seniors on this squad have accomplished more than any other football team in K-State history. No other group of seniors has put together such an impressive string of bowl appearances.

"They have accomplished much in that period of time," Coach Bill Snyder said. "They have worked very hard and they know they are appreciated.

"All of our seniors have developed a sense of roughness and sensitivity throughout the years," he said.

These seniors came into K-State when the football program was flat on its back.

But there was only one way to go from there.

"These guys have turned this program around in the four years they have been here," free-safety Mario Smith said.

Not only have these accomplished players reformed K-State football forever, but they have also taught the values of leadership and responsibility to the younger players on the football squad.

"We take the responsibility of teaching these younger guys how everything is ran around here," Smith said. "They do an awful lot off of the field."

Not only have the leaders as this squad taken the Wildcat football program to new levels of competition in the Big 12, but have also showcased the success of this football team to the rest of the NCAA.

"They came in here when the groundwork was laid down," Snyder said. "All they had to do was practice hard and play hard and hopefully be successful."

What great feats this senior class has accomplished. For the first time in K-State history, the senior class has defeated the Kansas Jayhawks in all four meetings. The only other time a Wildcat football team accomplished a feat of that nature was from 1924-27.

"Hopefully we have set the stage for this football team and for Kansas State University," Smith said.

Even the younger players on the team appreciate the senior leadership on the team.

"They never bow down," running back Mike Lawrence said. "We came from the bottom and we are only going up."

With a win Saturday against the Iowa State Cyclones, the Cats will almost be assured of a Cotton Bowl invitation, K-State's first ever New Year's game.

"I'd like to think that these seniors have carried us into another bowl game," Snyder said.

Notre Dame coach Holtz resigns amid media attention

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SOUTH BEND, Ind. — Lou Holtz acted like it was just another practice — pacing, yelling, racing around in his golf cart. There were no tears, no speeches, at least none for the public to see.

Holtz

He gave no indication that he spent Monday afternoon working out the final details of his resignation, which he planned to announce today at his weekly news conference.

"Practice went a little longer than I thought it would because I was eating Rolaids and I couldn't call them (players) up," Holtz said afterward. "It's just really difficult to stay focused on everything."

While he refused to say anything else, two university sources who spoke on the condition they not be identified told The Associated Press that Holtz will step down after 11 seasons at Notre Dame.

"He met with the administration and told them he's leaving," one of the two sources said.

School spokesman John Heisler declined to confirm that, saying only that Holtz met with athletic director Mike Wadsworth and the Rev. William Beauchamp, the university's executive vice president. Wadsworth declined comment, and Beauchamp was not immediately available.

"They have reached a decision and it will be announced at 1 p.m. tomorrow," Heisler said Monday.

Why Holtz, 59, is resigning after 11 seasons is not clear, but one possibility is that he wants another shot at the NFL, where he led the New York Jets to a 3-10 record in 1976 before resigning with one game left. One scenario has him coaching the Minnesota Vikings if current coach Dennis Green leaves.

Holtz met with his players before practice, and it appeared he had told them he was leaving. But they were as tight-lipped as their coach, preferring to let him make the announcement.

Senior linebacker Bert Berry would say, though, that he can't imagine what Notre Dame will be like without Holtz.

"Coach Holtz is such a great coach and I have so much admiration and respect for him," he said. "It's been an honor and a privilege to play for him, and I think anyone that's played for him would say the same thing."

Holtz's resignation ends nearly a week of speculation that he was leaving, which he did nothing to deny. Though there was some speculation he

Gutsy calls in Colorado give fans a change of pace

MY

Jeremy KELLEY

As we go about our everyday lives, we face changes all the time.

Wildcat football fans saw many changes in Saturday's contest against Colorado.

What was the deal with Bill Snyder's play calls on some of K-State's more memorable possessions?

K-State proceeded into Colorado territory for the first time in the game and Snyder called the old flea-flicker. Sure it would have worked — if Kevin Lockett wouldn't have been double-teamed by the Colorado defense like he had been all night long.

Yeah, Lockett is a great receiver and now the best in the Big 12, but the best receiver in the nation is going to have a tough time catching a pass while being defended by two and sometimes three players in a game.

But you have to credit Snyder with the gutsy play call. It was a new Snyder. Two plays after that, Snyder called for a reverse with Jimmy Dean, a wide receiver.

K-Staters rarely see the Wildcat offense run a reverse, and execute it with ease.

It was another gutsy call. Folsom Field was hard and slippery and Snyder wanted Dean to run as fast as he could to the corner, and then turn it for a first down?

Two plays to throw the pesky Buffalo defense off. Two plays that most fans haven't really seen from any K-State team. Two rough calls.

What if Snyder's changes had been successful. Lockett would have caught Brian Kavanagh's pass and K-State would be ahead 7-6 and we would have had a new ball game. But sometimes we can't always get the breaks.

It was a missed play, but not a bad call, and when changes are made in a football program, sometimes plays are missed and aren't successful.

Nonetheless, Snyder should not be criticized for the play calls he made. Do you ever notice that whenever anybody makes a change in anything he is almost certain to be criticized for his new ideas? Almost every time this is the case.

When Bill Snyder came into this program he changed things around. He didn't allow the media to come into the locker room after a game, win or lose, and he still does that today.

The media criticized him then and still criticizes him now for his changes. But let's take a look at Snyder's positive changes for the program.

Snyder has been credited for orchestrating the greatest turnaround in college football history. K-State was 1-36-1 in the 1980s and is now 56-24-1 in the 1990s and is only one of seven schools in the nation to win at least nine games over the last three seasons.

From 1971-1988 K-State could only accredit themselves with 50 wins over those 16 years. Now Snyder has surpassed the school record of 51 wins in just eight seasons.

Turnarounds are not strange to Snyder, as he helped Hayden Fry turn an Iowa program that had 17 consecutive to eight consecutive Bowl appearances before coming to Manhattan.

With the success of his football program, Snyder has completely turned this K-State football program around since he came here 1989. Since 1990, ticket sales have increased a total of 148 percent, and fan attendance has soared somewhere in the upwards of 300 percent.

Snyder has taken K-State to three consecutive bowl games and is assured of another one this year.

Snyder has developed this football program into one of the premier football programs in the nation. K-State has the sixth winningest home record in college football during the '90's.

So nobody should criticize Snyder for the changes he makes during a football game. Bill Snyder is the best thing that has happened to this football program since Mitch Holthus was the voice of the Wildcats (not that Greg Sharp isn't an excellent announcer), but Holthus was the first to glorify the Cats.

Just realize that Snyder has done what no other football coach in history has done — WIN!

Jeremy Kelley, a sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications and was added recently to the Collegian staff as the sports editor, is waiting for your comments at (weasal1@ksu.edu).

might make his announcement earlier, Tuesday's news conference is the logical place. Local media are there, and national media participate via conference call.

With Holtz gone, speculation turns to who will replace him. It was not immediately known if his successor would be announced Tuesday. Among the top contenders to take over college football's glamour job are Northwestern's Gary Barnett and Irish defensive coordinator Bob Davie.

The Chicago Sun-Times, citing unidentified sources, reported Monday that Notre Dame wanted Barnett to succeed Holtz and had agreed to talk with him. But Barnett said such talk was premature.

"I don't think you ever say never," he said Monday. "I don't know at this point in time. I would hope Northwestern wants me here. You never know."

Barnett, in shades of Holtz, also refused to say if he'd been contacted about the job.

"I'm not confirming or denying anything at this point in time," he said.

Others mentioned include LSU's Gerry DiNardo, former UCLA coach Terry Donahue and Wisconsin's Barry Alvarez.

Despite speculation about Holtz and the Vikings, the team's 10 owners appear far from settled on him. President Roger Headrick, appointed in 1991 as the owners' front man, seemed opposed to hiring Holtz if a coaching change is made.

Co-owner Wheelock Whitney told the Saint Paul Pioneer Press in Monday's editions that Holtz is his choice if the team needs a new coach.

The 10th-ranked Irish (7-2) have two games remaining — at home against Rutgers and at Southern California. A bowl bid, probably the Orange or Fiesta, would close out Holtz's career at Notre Dame.

He is 99-29-2 at Notre Dame — six wins shy of tying Knute Rockne's Irish school victory record — and 215-94-7 overall. But he encountered rough times recently.

Notre Dame lost 10 games in the last three seasons — more than his 1988-1993 squads lost combined.

His problems this year were due, in part, to his attempts to modernize his offense and make better use of Ron Powlus' throwing abilities. He abandoned his beloved running game for a spread offense, but his players never adjusted to it.

By the time he switched back midway through the season, the Irish had lost one game and their intensity. A loss to Air Force, which hadn't beaten Notre Dame since 1985, threatened hopes for a 10th straight bowl bid and further frustrated Holtz.

Some have questioned if health played a role in Holtz's decision.

A frail-looking man, he's had a series of health problems.

He underwent emergency surgery last fall to relieve pressure on his spinal cord, a condition that could have caused paralysis if left untreated.

> "Practice went a little longer than I thought it would because I was eating Rolaids and I couldn't call them (players) up. It's just really difficult to stay focused on everything."
> • LOU HOLTZ
> RESIGNING HEAD COACH FROM NOTRE DAME

But he said before the season began he'd never felt better.

"I've been more interested in doing things that maybe after 20-some years would get to be monotonous. They aren't now," he said. "I still have a burning desire to coach football."

Holtz came to Notre Dame with a reputation for reviving failing programs, and he endeared himself to the Irish faithful by rescuing Notre Dame. When he arrived in November 1985, Notre Dame had lost its place among the college elite after five mediocre seasons under Gerry Faust.

The Irish went 5-6 in Holtz's first season but rebounded the next year to finish 8-4 and earn their first bowl bid since 1984.

In 1988, just three years after he took over, the Irish upset then-No. 1 Miami on their way to their first national championship since 1977.

Notre Dame came close to repeating in 1989 but fell to Miami in the season finale.

Not even a win over top-ranked Colorado in the Orange Bowl could redeem the 12-1 Irish, and Miami won the national title.

Holtz had one more run at the title in 1993, when Notre Dame and Florida State each finished with one loss. Holtz said the Irish should have been No. 1 because they'd beaten the Seminoles head-to-head — the same reasoning that gave Miami the national championship in 1989.

But voters disagreed, and Notre Dame finished second to Florida State.

Player's work ethic bridges transition between old, new

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Whenever coaches come into a new program, they look for individuals who will help make the transition as smooth as possible — players who are willing to put in the extra effort.

At K-State, that player has been Missy Decker.

"Missy's got a great work ethic, and she's a very intense worker and player," Coach Deb Patterson said. "That's what you hope to have on the floor."

As a senior Decker might be expected to be one of the most resistant. She has, after all, been one of the team's top producers, playing under the same system for three years. Why should she change now?

"From the moment I first met Coach Patterson, I saw the vision she had for the season and the program," Decker said. "And being the daughter of a coach, I was taught you do what you're told. You adjust. There's no such thing as perfect basketball — there's always room for improvement."

> Missy's got a great work ethic, and she's a very intense worker and player.
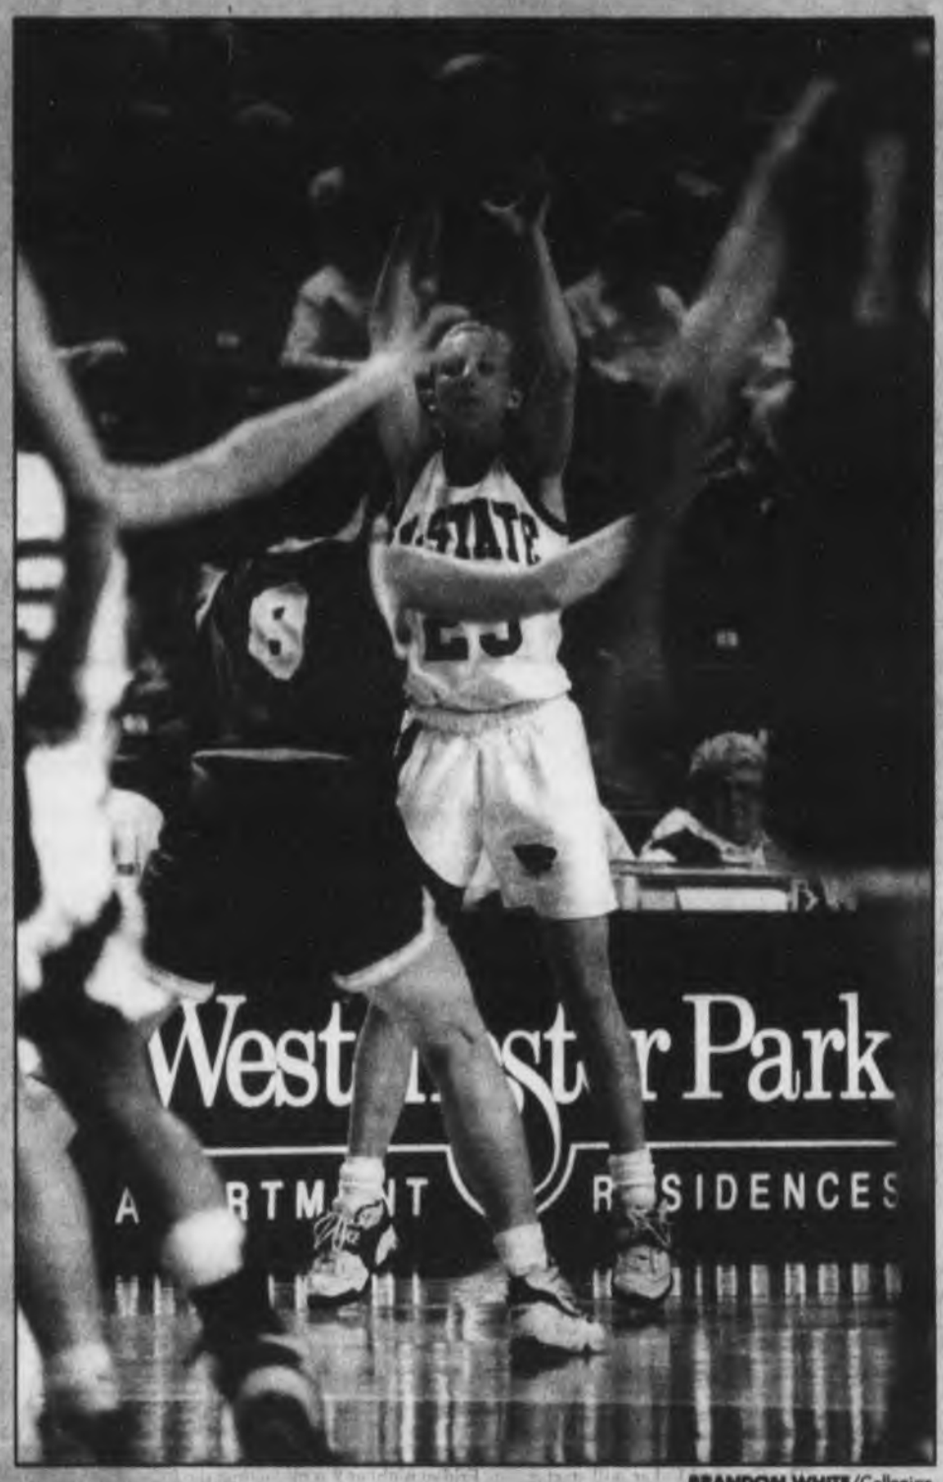
> • DEB PATTERSON
> WOMEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

In fact, Decker has taken on new roles altogether. Lacking a true point guard, the Wildcats have to rely on a number of players to share duties bringing the ball up the court.

Decker, a spot-up shooter who has played on the wing the last three years, has been one of the team's primary ball-handlers.

"We would like to use her more on the wing where she's more comfortable," Patterson said. "But she's been really willing to make that sacrifice, to come into the gym and say, 'This is going to work. I'm going to make this work.'"



Although that might be a new role for Decker, she said it was one with which she is comfortable.

"Initially, I don't think it was set out that way. But it worked out that way after the first couple weeks of practice," she said. "I've always had confidence in my ball-handling skills and passing skills.

"There may be a little more responsibility being a point guard – people looking at you all the time. I don't have a problem stepping up and taking charge whether I'm at the point guard or not. But as the point, you're who people look to."

It's that commitment, and Decker's accomplishments as an academic all-conference selection each of her three years make her one of the team's natural leaders on the floor — exactly the kind of person Patterson needs to keep the Wildcats on track this year, both in the game and in school.

"I think she'll be a great leader," Patterson said. "But it's most significant that we have a strong positive presence in this program on and off the floor."

'Pocahontas'

Children's Storybook Theater presents play at annual party

The Children's Storybook Theatre performed its version of "Pocahontas" Sunday afternoon at McCain Auditorium.

The show had little in common with the Walt Disney version, which was fine. CST produced a lighthearted and meaningful story. The show was a delightful introduction to theater for children, but it contained a lot of humor that was appropriate for adults.

There were only six people in the cast, which made it simpler and easier for children to follow. Simplicity was carried through to the set, which consisted of one large piece with steps, a platform and a section with an arch and curtains.

Two cast members provided a great deal of humor to the story. Samantha Wynn, who played Riana, did a beautiful job with body language and her voice. Her singing was strong, but not overpowering, and she showed a strong sense of comedic timing.

John Sparger, who played William Moore, also provided many laughs. Wynn made a perfect foil for Pocahontas, played by Tori Velle, and Sparger balanced out Capt. John Smith, played by Luke Darnell.

The cast was rounded out by Gene Bernath, who played a believably stiff yet comical Chief Powhatan. Franco Rourke served as a silly Running Deer.

Silliness abounded throughout the production. There was a lot of physical comedy that made children and adults alike laugh, but there were also lines aimed at adults.

The songs were enchanting and short. They carried messages that were universal and timely. Songs such as "Give it a Chance" and "Be Prepared" added to the story but reinforced important messages.

Instead of pretending to be a history lesson, it taught about human nature. People who seemed different learned to find out what they had in common. The message was delivered with humor and lightness.

After the show, the performers went out into the lobby of McCain and met their audience.

It was fun watching the kids go up to the actors and get their autographs.

The play was a nice introduction to the theater for children.

Meeting the actors only enhanced the experience.

If you are looking for a way to refresh your outlook on life, visit any children's theater production.

It's less commercialized than anything Walt Disney has to offer, and you don't have to worry about buying your kids the action-figure kids' meal at Burger King for the next six months.

STD cases in college students directly related to condom use

Scott Phillips
staff reporter

Use a condom.

According to a recent poll in American Health magazine, most college students who contract sexually transmitted diseases did so because they did not use a condom.

"There is too much crap out there not to use (a condom), not to mention AIDS," Andy Richards, senior in management information systems, said.

STDs affects one in four Americans, said former surgeon general C. Everett Koop said.

Although there are more than 20 STDs, the more common ones are genital herpes, chlamydia, gonorrhea, syphilis and genital warts. The most common STD is genital herpes.

Genital herpes affects more than 55 million Americans. It is a very contagious, recurrent infection caused by a virus that occurs around the sex organs. Genital herpes viruses are classified under two types.

Type one is the most common, with cold sores around the lips, tongue and mouth.

Type two causes sores on or around the genitals through genital contact.

There is no cure for genital herpes, but it can be treated. If not treated, herpes can spread, last longer and hurt even more.

Chlamydia is a common STD found more in women than in men. Seventy-five percent of cases of chlamydia occur in women, and 25 percent occur in men.

The symptoms, if any, include a yellowish genital discharge and painful or a burning sensation during urination.

Also included are abdominal pain during intercourse or swelling of the testicles.

Chlamydia is a treatable infection with appropriate medication. As is true in all STD cases, the earlier the better. If left untreated in women, chlamydia can lead to pelvic inflammatory disease. This disease can prevent women from having children.

Gonorrhea, more commonly referred to as the clap, has symptoms similar to those of chlamydia. However, it is no more common in women than it is in men. It is also treatable through medication.

Another STD is syphilis. Syphilis shows up as painlful sores in the genital area or the mouth. These sores can disappear and could be mild even without treatment.

Treatment for syphilis is also possible through medication. If left untreated, syphilis can lead to serious health problems including brain damage and possibly death.

Finally, genital warts are a common disease with small bumps found on genitals. Sometimes, they might not be visible.

This disease is not curable, but it is treatable. Human papillomavirus is the virus that causes genital warts, and some types of HPV can lead to cancer. In women, if not treated, the disease can be passed to her infant during childbirth.

According to Lafene Health Center, three out of four college students will have a sexual experience of some nature while at college.

For those who choose not to abstain from sex to prevent STDs, the American Social Health Association suggests that sexual pleasure doesn't have to be given up.

Rather, one should find ways to have sex more safely.

Also suggested is limiting the number of partners, seeing a doctor if possible symptoms of an STD occur and, most importantly, using a condom.

For extra protection, using a spermicide such as Nonoxynal-9 helps kill the bacteria and viruses that cause STDs.

It has a sports talk show. It covers K-State women's basketball and produces a show called "Around the I-70 League."

"If anyone wants to help out in the sports department, they are more than welcome," Haney said.

Heidi Evert, senior in electronic journalism and assistant news director, said DB92 will begin looking for news staff at the beginning of second semester.

"There is really no selection process," she said, "because we usually have barely enough people that want to do the news."

Those who work in the news department get to do on-air broadcasts and fieldwork outside the studio.

DB92 will provide training for students who are interested in any positions.

Applications will be available through the end of the semester. Students may call Montgomery at 532-2330 if they have any questions.

See Italy in gallery during school break

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Venturing to Italy for Thanksgiving Break might sound out of the question.

One can do just that with a show of photographs by Robert Arens, assistant professor of architecture, in the Chang Gallery.

Arens' collection of photos are the result of spending last semester living in Italy with students who participated in the College of Architecture, Planning and Design study session.

Living at a study center in Castiglion Fiorentino, in the Tuscany region of Italy, Arens said it was easy to travel throughout most of Italy both solo and as a group.

Nonetheless, Arens' photographs aren't mere records of his travels or brochure-quality pictures.

"I can't say I was looking for anything in particular," Arens said.

"I was looking for qualities in spaces.

"If I was struck by a space, I would then try to look why it affected me — why did it move me," he said.

Arens said he studied the spaces through different techniques, but mainly either sketching, visually observing, or with the camera.

Following the ambiguous nature for what Arens was searching, the exhibit's scope of photographs is far-reaching, from a distant vantage point terminating with a cathedral to a remarkably unusual detail to a landscape.

"The point of the exhibit isn't representations," Arens said. "I'm not trying to recreate Italy.

"I'm trying to show studies of the various Italian spaces."

The unconventional installation of the exhibit keeps consistent with Arens' always different take on his subjects, such his "(Dis)mantle" installation of fall 1995.

Rather than pin up an array of photographs, Arens has compiled them in books, which set on tables, or placards hanging on walls.

The photographs themselves appear unfinished, similar to the haphazard, process look of a sketch.

"I think of these as sketchbooks," Arens said.

"I'm trying to change the relationship between the photographs and the viewer."

Arens has visited Italy many times and, each time, leaves with a new experience.

Arens said he considers Italians to have mastered the use of materials for building, although the settings are usually more interesting than the buildings themselves.

"The object in relation to the objects around it seem to be important to them," he said.

"Every square inch of Italy has been thought about by someone," he said.

"It's as if there is no natural space, although it feels natural."

How does it figure into his design class lecturing?

"These spaces had a profound effect on me, but more in an indirect way," Arens said.

"You can't put a finger on it, and I think that's best."

An exhibit of photographs by Robert Arens will be in Seaton Hall's Chang Gallery until Nov. 27. Gallery hours are from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Art changes with new technology

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Twenty years ago, an artist could paint, sculpt, photograph, draw or print.

These conventional techniques have remained mostly unchanged for decades.

Since the 1980s, art has exploded into the realm of new technology with the development of the personal computer — a paradigm shift for artistic endeavors.

The evolution of technology and its effect on the artistic process is very much apparent in Robert Grame's Master of Fine Arts exhibit of his graphic design work in the K-State Student Union Gallery.

Grame, who studied graphic design as an undergraduate as well, has included works which run the gamut from what could be considered more conventional art to experimentations in typography to CD-ROM and Web-page design.

What makes Grame's show almost required viewing this season is the excellent way it bridges the sensitive gap between commercial graphic design and art.

It's not surprising to read in the gallery comments book a few blurbs attacking Grame's work as commercial and too business to be art.

That's not entirely unfair, for the north wall of the gallery is just that: designs for a commercial CD-ROM on Mesa Verde National Park, posters for the art department, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art and the art department's Web-page.

Grame said he became involved with the CD-ROM projects when he came back to K-State for his masters after working for two years.

The Mesa Verde CD-ROM should be commercially available soon, he said.

Now that he has achieved his master's degree, Grame said he plans to seek employment designing CD-ROMs.

"CD-ROM is a medium that's still emerging," he said. "It's about three years old and still has a lot of possibilities, though it's not as fast as the World Wide Web.

"All of these mediums can be very dynamic and they are."

However, the remaining gallery walls are unquestionably very personal expressions of Grame's experiences in life and with other artists' work.

Pointing to his more expressionist works, such as "Rebirth" and "Losing Faith," Grame said, "The subject matter is very personal in nature, but they are also driven by design as well.

"I want to push the ideas of space, structure and depth."

In "Losing Faith," a nude female is vigorously pressed out of a frame as if just pushed away.

Grame's use of color isn't necessarily heightened by the computer's resources.

It maintains a very primary, if a bit warm, scheme that follows through most of the work.

"There's a definite continuity with the color," Grame said.

The ease with which Grame's work unites as a whole and its seamless design suggests the design process is easy, especially using a computer.

That couldn't be further from the truth.

"The computer is not the magic box people make it out to be," Grame said. "It's just one more tool. It's not the end-all method."

By exhibiting the variety of his work side-by-side, Grame's artistic style can be traced from his art into his more commercial works.

His designs for the brochures for the art museum and the art department's visiting artists poster are accomplished for this campus.

Although they don't necessarily push the envelope, they are a reminder that artists can flourish, as Lautrec did, producing posters.

The Master of Fine Arts exhibit of work by Grame will be in the Union Art Gallery until Nov. 30.

Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Meet your K-State ambassador candidates

The new ambassadors will be announced at halftime of the Iowa State University vs. K-State football game. The ambassadors represent the K-State student body at official University and alumni events during the next year.

Jason Ellis
junior in agricultural journalism

Being a K-State ambassador requires SOMETHING — experience as a student leader, pride in our Wildcats and knowledge of our University. In my more than two years as a student at K-State, I have become involved in activities campus-wide that have broadened my knowledge of various colleges, programs and personnel that make K-State what it is.

My involvement on campus, from president of my college council to a member of the Student Alumni Board, has given me the opportunity to meet students from other universities within the state as well as around the nation. In comparing K-Staters to everyone else I have had the opportunity to meet, we are unbeaten in the pride we have in our University.

It would be an honor to travel Kansas as a K-State ambassador demonstrating the pride we have in K-State, "the student-scholar capital of America's public universities," as Paul Harvey once said.

When someone asks me 20 years from now about my greatest experience at K-State, I will tell them it was serving as the students' representative for the University — K-State ambassador.

I wi!l not refuse to do the SOMETHING I can do, serve K-State with experience, pride and knowledge as a 1996-97 K-State ambassador.

Jason Heinrich
sophomore in industrial engineering

Why do I want to be a K-State ambassador? There can only be one answer: Wildcat pride!

- Do you know K-State ranks fourth in the nation in its number of national scholars?
- Do you know research being done at K-State suggests working muscles may also work your brain?
- Do you know K-State has more than 350 clubs and organizations?
- I know you know K-State football is ranked ninth in the nation. But did you know the seniors on the team have never lost to the University of Kansas?

Wildcat pride excites me! I want to be a member of the team that (1) promotes K-State as the university with the best and the brightest students, (2) attracts the top scholars and leaders to a best buy in college education for its affordability, high academic standards and top-notch student body and (3) spreads the spirit of Wildcat pride to people everywhere.

It is a win-win adventure. Being an ambassador is an opportunity for me to proclaim Wildcat pride throughout the land.

It is a chance for K-State to be praised by someone who really cares. People need to know K-State has the finest and most determined people anywhere. People need to know the opportunity to grow excellence is found in the heartland of America ... in Manhattan, at K-State. As an ambassador, people will know I believe in Wildcat pride.

Ryan Laudermilk
senior in modern languages

K-State is entering its golden age, and I want to be a part of it. From our increasing number of national scholars to our ever-improving athletic programs, we are growing bigger and better with every new challenge.

Our newest challenge is our entrance into the Big 12 Conference, and I can't wait to see where this new opportunity will lead us.

I would love to use my abilities to contribute to K-State's advancement and success. As ambassador, my responsibilities would include recruitment activities and officially representing the students, faculty and alumni of K-State.

I believe wholeheartedly I am more than capable for these responsibilities. In my past leadership positions on this campus, I have learned to be open and approachable, and to deal well with all types of people.

These qualities will help me represent K-State with a positive image and sell K-State to prospective students. I will strive to continue the trend of recruiting the best and the brightest and making our student body strong, enthusiastic and full of student leaders.

With my University respect and campus pride, K-State can go nowhere but up. I am excited for the opportunity to contribute my unique abilities toward our advancement into the golden age of K-State.

Stephanie Trembley
sophomore in pre-law

K-State has always been a part of my life. From the time I was a little girl, I wanted to attend K-State. I guess you could say purple pride runs deep in my veins. It is for this very reason I want to represent this University as an ambassador.

I want to show people what K-State is all about, and I can do that by relating many of my personal experiences to them. By showing potential students what K-State has given me, it is my hope they will begin to see all the benefits that can be gained by attending K-State.

Not only is it important to build a future for K-State by bringing in new students, but it is also imperative to maintain the standards of excellence set by the former students on this campus.

K-State alumni are one of the best resources this University has. Their continued support of all aspects of this University proves pride in K-State is not something one people have only for four years, but it is something that they will carry with them for a lifetime.

As an ambassador, I will be a link between the future and the past of K-State. By serving as a representative of the current student body, I wi! demonstrate the pride that began with our alumni is being maintained and will be preserved for many years to come.

Ashley Youle
junior in mass communications

I am a Wildcat. I will be tomorrow, and I will be forever. Not everyone is a Wildcat, and I think people should be able to see what Wildcats have that others don't.

I want to be a K-State ambassador, because not only would it be a great honor to represent our school, but I would love to have the chance to travel around the state spreading the word to prospective students that K-State is the place for them!

Being from Kansas and having Lived here my entire life, I know when it came time to decide which college to go to, the choice was a difficult one.

During that time I saw how Dedicated the K-State ambassadors were, and because of this dedication they had a great deal of influence on my college decision. I would like to have the opportunity to affect someone's life like they affected mine.

Using the Communication skills I have learned in the field of public relations as well as the experiences I have had with the Student Alumni Board, I feel I could successfully introduce students to the opportunities K-State has to offer.

As Ambassador, I will give 110 percent, and I will represent our school not only with Tenacious Big 12 pride, but more importantly, K-State pride!

Allison Woodall
junior in mass communications

Each person on this page has a tremendous amount of K-State pride and enthusiasm. However, pride and enthusiasm alone do not get the job of representing K-State done. I have used my four years at K-State to gain extensive knowledge of our University and its resources. I can use this knowledge to sell K-State.

Not only have I promoted K-State as a whole, but also the football program, the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, the City of Manhattan and even the Sunset Zoological Park. I consider K-State and Manhattan my home, and each day I work to continue their success.

First, I would work to bring the best and the brightest students to K-State. These students are the future of the University. I believe by sharing my K-State experience and knowledge I can convince them K-State is the place to continue their education.

I will also work with the alumni to increase their support, which allows continued University growth. The key is getting more alumni to catch the wave of excitement that is currently sweeping K-State.

Your part is easy. Vote. It does matter. When it comes right down to it, this election is not about me or any of the students on this page. Not really. It is about you and the continued growth and success of your school.

Informational kiosk re-opens in Union

BRANDON WHITE/Collegian

RON BURNSTINE of Campus InterAction points out features on the new Interactive kiosk in the K-State Student Union to Johnny King, manager at the College of Education copy center.

MATT BASLER
staff reporter

The age of information has hit the K-State Student Union in a big way with the arrival of the new and improved Interactive Kiosk Experience .

Although IKE has been in the Union for over a year, it was recently updated to include a larger variety of functions that serve to inform students.

The previous system was limited in what it had to offer, but after some work, the new system is finally ready to roll.

"We spent the last year-and-a-half advancing the program, and it's given us a chance to see what the students want on the program," Ron Burnstine, marketing consultant for Campus Interaction, said.

Burnstine said there are many students who do not know what IKE has to offer.

"If I had a dime for every student who asked 'What's this?' or 'What's that?,' I could retire," Burnstine said.

The kiosk offers two screens in which students can browse through the latest music and movie reviews, look at different magazines, learn about new video games and sign up to win free prizes.

The third screen offers the Kansas State University Web page for students who want to learn more about the University.

"It's a wonderful wealth of information that is all geared towards the students," Burnstine said.

The kiosk also offers advertising for local merchants in addition for national companies at no cost to students, Burnstine said.

In fact, it is the advertisers who pay for the material on IKE.

In addition to the three main screens, there is another screen that offers daily events on K-State's campus. This allows students a quick reference as to what is happening on any given day, Burnstine said.

Burnstine said he is optimistic about IKE's catching on.

"This system will constantly evolve and change," he said.

SPEAKER

"We need active American leadership in the U.N.," he said. "It is a natural marriage."

This is a time when the United States could be seizing some real opportunities. He said it needs to stop fussing over things that are minuscule in the larger scheme of things.

"Windows of opportunity don't always stay open," Luck said. "The leadership void is sitting out there. If we don't fill it, who will?"

Leadership does not mean forcing your want onto others, Luck said. People will recognize the United States for its good and powerful leadership if it is a little more realistic.

This is not a Democrat or Republican thing; it is a global thing, he said.

People care about the issues, he said, but they care about 13 or 14 other things first. They care about AIDS but fail to see it in a global perspective, Luck said.

"The U.N. does an extraordinary job, and it is the only one who can do it," Luck said. "People don't want to get involved with conflicts around the world, but you need that international presence."

He said the organization planned as impotent and uninvolved approved Desert Storm. As an organization, the United Nations should be praised, he said.

"I'm always the optimist," he said. "I hope President Clinton will turn to world affairs in his second term. I'm not going to bet the farm on it, but I hope it happens."

At a reception for Luck in the Cats' Pause lounge in the Union, Lou Douglas interns Jenny Hart and Laura Cress talked about their work with the lecture series this year.

Cress, a junior in life science, said the speech helped her understand the politics of foreign relations. She said it related well to this year's theme, "Democracy Under Siege."

Hart, a junior in finance, said she gained a better understanding of how the United States works with the United Nations.

LANDON

Reagan's press secretary. He retained the job when Bush was elected president in 1988, making him the only press secretary to serve two U.S. presidents.

Fitzwater said his tenure as press secretary will be the main focus of his speech.

"I'd like to talk about some of the changes in journalism over the past 20 years," he said. "I also want to talk about what it was like to serve with two presidents and to work with the elite of the journalism world."

In addition to talking about his own past, Fitzwater said he might talk about the recent presidential election.

"I'll probably reflect on it," he said in regard to the election. "I have some thoughts on the problems of getting elected today."

But Fitzwater said the lecture is also a reason to come back to K-State.

"I'm looking forward to talking to old teachers and classmates," he said.

In addition, Fitzwater said he was honored to give a Landon Lecture.

"It's a thrill to be able to follow in the footsteps of lecturers like Presidents Reagan and Bush," he said. "It's a very prestigious forum."

PARK

type of industry that would be allowed to develop in the park and the overall aesthetic appearance of the park.

Greer said the main purpose of the proposal before the commission is to purchase the land that will be used for the development of a business park.

"In the future, we need a very focused process that master-plans the area so that all the neighbors and all interested in developing the area will be included in the process," Greer said about the next steps for the development of the site.

Commissioner Edith Stunkel said the city administrators plan to include the entire community in the planning.

"We want not just the adjacent neighbors; we want the entire community to be involved, " Stunkel said.

Hansa also said he was concerned about the proposal, because he has noticed a lot of poor development decisions made by the City of Manhattan over the years.

Hansa said he would participate in future public meetings as much as he can to help ensure the city keeps its commitment of working openly with the community in developing the park.

Potential recruit's eligibility unsure

SPEED

▶ A Claflin High School basketball player, who was a potential recruit for K-State, could run into problems with Southwest Missouri State due to an advertisement that ran in the Great Bend Tribune.

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Jackie Stiles, perhaps the best girls' basketball player in Kansas since Lynette Woodard, chose Southwest Missouri State over dozens of schools competing for her skills next season.

K-State was one of three schools Stiles had on her short list before announcing Monday she would sign with Southwest.

Now the Claflin senior's eligibility might be in question because of an advertisement placed in the Great Bend Tribune encouraging Stiles to attend Southwest.

A 5'9" guard, Stiles averaged 38.5 points per game as a junior and was selected to the U.S. Junior National Team last summer. Rated the No. 6 senior in the Blue Star Index, a women's basketball scouting service, Stiles made visits to Colorado, Connecticut, K-State, Oklahoma and Southwest before the fall signing period began Nov. 13.

With the Nov. 20 deadline for early signing approaching, an advertisement was placed Sunday in the sports section of the Tribune, a local paper, encouraging Stiles to attend Southwest.

With "Fans for Jackie" in the top left corner, the advertisement declared, "Southwest Missouri will have STYLE with Stiles! Please pick Southwest!"

Tom Larimer, publisher of the Tribune, said the ad had been purchased by a local individual, but the policy of the paper prevented him from revealing who purchased the ad.

Mary Wynn, women's athletic director at Southwest, said her office had been contacted about the legality of taking out an ad about two weeks ago. The secretary answering the phone told the caller she was unsure and said she would check with the athletic administration.

"Our secretary had received a phone call from a man asking if it was legal for an ad to be in the paper," Wynn said. "I told her that it was not, and she said he was going to call back, but he never called back.

"We certainly want to know who placed the ad, too."

Wynn said she would consult with Patty Viverito, associate commissioner of the Missouri Valley Conference, who will be in Springfield during the weekend for the Missouri Valley volleyball tournament.

Whether purchased by the University or a booster, purchasing such an advertisement is a violation of NCAA recruiting regulations.

Steve Mallonee, director of legislative services at the NCAA, said he was unable to comment on the matter, but that if it were determined the ad was a violation of NCAA regulations, Stiles' eligibility at Southwest might be jeopardized.

"Any violation of a recruiting regulation, if determined a violation, would jeopardize the prospect's eligibility at that particular school," Mallonee said.

In many cases, schools found in violation of NCAA recruiting guidelines are punished by losing the recruit in question.

• See SECTION 13 Page 3

NCAA SECTION 13: Recruiting

A Great Bend Tribune advertisement could jeopardize Jackie Stiles' eligibility at Southwest Missouri State because of two infractions against the recruiting section of the NCAA manual. Here are the two points from section 13.

- SECTION 13.4.5.1 Recruiting advertisements
  An institution may not buy or arrange to have space in printed materials concerning athletic participation or evaluation of prospects.
- SECTION 13.4.5.3 Miscellaneous promotions
  Institutions and their representatives are prohibited from financing, arranging or utilizing recruiting aids (e.g. newspaper advertisements) designed to publicize the institution's interest in a particular prospect.

KARA FERGUSON, senior in pre-medicine, cheers on the crowd at the bodybuilding event Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House. Ferguson is a member of the Smurthwaite Scholarship/Leadership House.

BUILDING SPIRIT

Greeks, residence halls, living complexes compete in bodybuilding

STORY BY R.J. DIEPENBROCK

Ahearn Field House shook and rocked in old tradition as the bodybuilding preliminaries took off to the tunes of "YMCA" by the Village People and "My Sharona" by The Knack Wednesday night.

The bodybuilding competition not only raised school spirit of those who competed and watched, but it also lent a helping hand to the Flint Hills Breadbasket as canned food was collected for admission, said Kristen Mehan, junior in public health nutrition and Panhellenic Council executive secretary.

"It adds something to the event," said Chris Sheeran, senior in biology and member of the Strong Complex team. "It's good to be able to help the community."

Sheeran said it was great to be able to have fun and help people.

The competition began around 6:30 p.m. and ended around 9 p.m., when the winners were announced.

Of the residence halls, Strong Complex swept both the bodybuilding and the spirit-banner events and will perform during halftime of the K-State women's basketball game Friday night.

The spirit-banner winner for the greek houses was the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team.

Five finalists from the 12 greek teams will conclude bodybuilding competition at 5:30 p.m. today in Ahearn. The winner of the finals will perform at halftime of the K-State men's basketball game Friday.

"This was great," said Tami Pratt, junior in elementary education and member of the Strong Complex team, "especially since we're one of the smaller groups."

Pratt, who choreographed her team's dance routine, said it was fun to get out and support school spirit.

During the competition, each team performed a five-minute routine to music. The routine was similar to cheerleading routines. There were dancers, tumblers and pyramids. Each team did its best to work the audience into a screaming, clapping, stomping frenzy.

Once the performances were through, the judges, faculty from K-State, voted for who they think were the top five teams.

Aaron Dunn, a member of the Alpha Chi Omega/Kappa Sigma/Alpha Gamma Rho team, said even though practicing for two months was hard work, he enjoyed seeing it come together.

"It was a lot of fun," Dunn, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, said. "Winning — that's what we're trying to do."

Gavin Schmitz, sophomore in construction science and member of the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team, said it was a rush, because it was his first time.

"It's nuts. Its crazy," Schmitz said. "To hear everyone cheer. The houses kinda supporting each other — it's great."

Guy Gross, junior in pre-medicine and member of the Pi Beta Phi/Sigma Lambda Gamma/Alpha Tau Omega team, said he couldn't believe all the people who were there and the excitement of the event.

"This is awesome," Gross said. "It's great to work hard and then come here and do well."

Monica Sneed, sophomore in business, said she competed last year and would do it again next year.

"It is so incredible," said Sneed, a member of the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team. "Everything happening — it is such a rush."

Taylor Colbert, a teammate of Sneed's, said the excitement of the crowd was great.

"We were all so excited," Colbert said. "It's just amazing what is going on here."

Latina sorority plans to compete for 1st year

ERICA DUNCAN
staff reporter

The Sigma Lambda Gamma sorority will be panting and chanting along with the rest of the sororities and fraternities this year.

Pi Beta Phi, Alpha Tau Omega and Sigma Lambda Gamma are teaming up for Homecoming activities. This is the Latina sorority Sigma Lambda Gamma's first time participating in the Homecoming festivities.

"It's our first time, and it's all new. We're learning a lot," Adriana Luna, senior in human resource management and marketing, said.

The Sigma Lambda Gammas do not have a sorority house, and with only 11 members, the Sigma Lambda Gammas have had a difficult time coordinating schedules.

The Sigma Lambda Gammas have been to the ATO house to help pomp the float and to the Pi Phi house to work on the spirit banner.

"They have done a good job in what they have participated in," Gabe Graham, ATO Homecoming chair and junior in business, said. "We are excited to have them."

The ATOs and Pi Phis have been showing the Sigma Lambda Gammas the ropes of Homecoming week.

"We are showing them what to do, so they can get more involved," Janelle Lagerstrom, Pi Phi Homecoming chair and senior in biology, said.

Because the sorority is small, they had to co-sponsor a Homecoming team with the Pi Phis. It would not have been fair to put all the pressure on the fraternities, Luna said.

The Sigma Lambda Gammas are enjoying the overall experience and hope to bring more recognition to the sorority, Luna said.

"The Pi Phis and ATOs are really great and understanding," Luna said.

The preparation for Homecoming progresses throughout the week with body building, pomping the float and Pant the Chant.

Study established to gauge teachers' ability to lecture

ASHLEY WEEKLY
staff reporter

The Office of the Provost is conducting a study to see how well students can understand professors and graduate teaching assistants who do not speak English as their first language.

"Clearly, this is an area students and parents are concerned with," said Ron Downey, director of institutional research and analysis.

Downey said the office is collecting information for a special study to see if K-State has a problem with its instructors. They want to find a way to deal with students' concerns.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said the program is designed to improve the instructors at K-State.

"This program is a direct response to our interest in improving the quality of the undergraduate experience at K-State," Bosco said.

Chris Hansen, student body president, has helped publicize the program. He said he thinks the program is worthwhile.

"The provost is taking a good approach. We need to solve these problems. I see it as an accountability tool. It gives students a good outlet to get their concerns

▶ GREAT AMERICAN SMOKEOUT

Americans urged to participate today in kicking the butts

CHRIS DEAN
staff reporter

People across the country let out their last breath of smoke at midnight Nov. 20.

It is estimated that 10.5 million Americans will quit smoking for 24 hours today for the American Cancer Society's 20th annual Great American Smokeout.

"It's a day we can focus our attention to the hazards of tobacco," said Joan Smith, health educator and promoter at the Riley County/Manhattan Health Department. "It has been found that people who get a target quit day and can plan for that have greater success. If they can make it 24 hours, they think, 'I could quit for good and stay smoke-free.'"

In order to help people quit, the Manhattan Health Department is sponsoring an informational booth at Manhattan Town Center, ads in the local papers and an Adopt-A-Smoker program.

The Adopt-A-Smoker program is designed to provide support and encouragement to people who are trying to quit. People can adopt their friends or co-workers. The program even has children adopting their parents.

"They adopt a smoker for the 24 hours and help that person quit. For some people this is a stronger addiction than heroin," Smith said.

Livestock team breaks 60-year-long drought

HEATHER HJELTLAND

The K-State livestock judging team accomplished a feat no other team has since the 1930s.

It's the first time since 1936, 1937 and 1938 a team with the same coach has won the North American International Livestock Judging Contest for three consecutive years, said Scott Schaake, livestock judging team coach and assistant professor of animal science.

24 HOURS IN REVIEW

NATION WORLD

• ARMY SEXUAL MISCONDUCT. An Army review found 44 disciplinary actions for sexual misconduct since 1995 at Fort Sam Houston's medical school, where five sergeants were disciplined after a happy bus drinking trip to Mexico. The 44 disciplinary cases stem from 23 incidents during a two-year period. Allegations ranged from fraternization to sexual harassment to rape.

• GAY MAN WINS SETTLEMENT IN SCHOOL HARASSMENT CASE. Jamie Nabozny was regularly spat on and beaten up in school, subjected to a mock rape and kicked in the belly so many times he needed surgery. On Wednesday, Nabozny, now 21, accepted a $900,000 settlement, ending the first federal trial of a school district for not protecting a gay student from harassment.

Nabozny said the gay-bashing started when he entered Ashland Middle School in 1988 and continued until he dropped out as a junior.

• GINGRICH RE-ELECTED AS SPEAKER. Newt Gingrich is preparing for a second term as House speaker as Republican respect for his leadership has outweighed concerns about his ethics clouds and his unpopularity with the public. House Republicans, meeting today to select their leaders for the next Congress, seemed likely to vote by acclamation to keep the Georgian in the post he has had the past two years.

Gingrich, 53, is widely credited with masterminding the GOP's 1994 capture of the House, and most Republicans say he did an effective job as speaker and in helping them retain their majority in this month's elections.

• MORE REFUGEES LEAVE ZAIRE. A thousand Rwandan Hutus broke free from retreating Hutu militiamen in eastern Zaire to begin their long trek home Wednesday, and tens of thousands more also were on the move.

The U.N. World Food Program said 100,000 refugees were heading from Bukavu at the south end of Lake Kivu north toward Masisi, scene of reported fighting Wednesday between Hutu militias and Rwandan-backed Zairian rebels.

• BOUTROS-GHALI BATTLE CONTINUES. Boutros Boutros-Ghali's refusal to bow out after the United States vetoed his re-election as U.N. secretary-general comes as no surprise to those who know him.

On Tuesday, the United States cast the lone vote against Boutros-Ghali in the 15-member Security Council. But the 74-year-old Egyptian diplomat said he would remain a candidate as U.N. rules permit. African diplomats met Wednesday on whether to continue supporting him.

• DRUG LORD GETS LIFE IN PRISON. A crack dealer who tried to get his drug conviction overturned by claiming the CIA was involved in cocaine dealing for the benefit of the Nicaraguan Contras was sentenced to life in prison.

"Freeway" Ricky Ross was convicted in March of buying 220 pounds of cocaine for $169,000 from Oscar Danilo Blandon, a former narcotics trafficker and civilian leader of a CIA-backed guerrilla group, who also worked as a federal drug informant.

But on Tuesday, the judge refused and handed down the life sentence, which was mandatory because of two prior convictions. Sentencing was originally set for Sept. 13, but the judge delayed it to study the CIA allegations.

• CHRISTOPHER IMPROVES CHINA TIES DURING VISIT. Secretary of State Warren Christopher agreed with Chinese leaders Wednesday that U.S.-China relations are improving, despite lingering disputes over Taiwan and human rights.

In many respects, Christopher appeared to have achieved what his aides said was a basic goal: to discuss the wide range of concerns, including human rights and weapons sales, that affect U.S.-China relations without letting any one issue hold relations hostage.

SPORTS

• ONE OLYMPIAN AT HOMECOMING. If you were planning on seeing all five of K-State's Olympians at this weekend's Homecoming festivities, think again. Only Ed Broxterman, senior in mathematics and education, and member of the men's high-jump team, will be in Manhattan.

"Ed Broxterman will be representative of the K-State Olympian group," said Heather Lansdowne, assistant director of alumni programs.

Broxterman will serve as honorary Grand Marshall in the parade and will also serve as a representative for the other Olympians. A press release from News Services speculated that all five Olympians would be in town for the parade, barring any scheduling conflicts. Lansdowne said Mitch Richmond, a member of the U.S. men's basketball team and a 1988 graduate of K-State, cannot attend because he is in the middle of basketball season for the Sacramento Kings. Another Olympian, Steve Fritz, fourth-place finisher in the decathlon and 1992 graduate, has recruiting obligations. Other Olympians who will not be attending include Connie Teaberry, 1992 graduate and member of the women's high jump team, and Kenny Harrison, gold-medal winner in the triple jump and 1988 graduate. Broxterman will be honored during Saturday morning's parade and at the afternoon's football game.

Space experiment might benefit high-school science programs

SCOTT PHILLIPS
staff reporter

A local experiment might bring space technology 90,200 feet closer to the world of science education.

Lloyd Verhage, a network administrator for Justin Hall, with the help of physics and engineering club members and volunteers, launched a computer into space.

"This is what you wouldn't call a space project," Verhage said. "This was more like a near-space project. We were trying to get as close to a space environment as possible. We got the balloon up to nearly 90,200 feet, which is about 17 miles."

> "This is what you wouldn't call a space project. This was more like a near-space project."
> • LLOYD VERHAGE
> JUSTIN HALL NETWORK ADMINISTRATOR

The goal was to launch the balloon 100,000 feet or higher into the atmosphere. They also intended to have a microcomputer report back to the ground on radiation conditions, temperature, latitude and longitude, wind conditions and other general atmospheric information.

The computer was secured in a capsule that was stuffed with Styrofoam and attached to a helium-filled weather balloon. In all, the whole contraption was nearly 50 feet in length.

"This project took me about 18 months to complete and this was basically a test run," Verhage said. "Letting go of the capsule was a sensational feeling. It took about a half dozen of us to slowly let the balloon rise into the air. I felt as if I was letting my baby go."

The balloon eventually landed back on the ground about 10 miles southeast of Pittsburg, Kan.

The collected data gave Verhage information for the next time a launch is scheduled.

"We are scheduling another launch in March," Verhage said. "This project is geared toward something that can be taught to high school students who have done well in school and are ready for some hands-on work.

"In a few years, I would like to be teaching physics and students could possibly learn about the system in space, perform experiments and then for a semester be able to launch one of their own."

Verhage said that he has had a lot of help from Steve Kelly from the physics and electronics department as well as Norm Dillman in engineering.

The Manhattan Area Amateur Radio Society members have been the most involved students.

The launch in March will be similar to this one except this one will have an amateur television attached to the capsule. This will provide live video rather than the snapshot photos that the microcomputer captured during this launch.

"Whatever the winds do, that is where we go," Verhage said.

addressed," Hansen said. "This program shows the administration's commitment to the students."

Students can report concerns by calling or visiting the Office of the Provost or Hansen. Downey said students can report communication concerns, including not being able to hear their professor or the professor's inability to explain concepts.

Dustin Schafer, junior in architectural engineering, said he thinks K-State has a problem with its instructors.

"I think K-State definitely has a problem with students' not being able to understand professors. It is not fair to students when they have to pay for classes they get nothing out of," Schafer said.

After the report has been made, the related department or program head will sit in on the student's class to verify whether the concern is valid.

An evaluation on the reported instructor will be done. Downey said the result might be working with a speech pathologist, getting advice from experts on teaching or even removing the professor or GTA. He said the instructor would need to meet K-State's expectations and standards.

All the steps taken would be to improve the quality of K-State's instructors. Downey said of the reports already made, few have been students with tremendous problems with an instructor.

Downey said if only one student has a concern with a professor, an individual solution will be found.

The student might be assigned to another class. He said the longer the study goes the more potential value they find for the program. The study will continue into the spring.

The athletes' letters of intent are voided by the NCAA, and the athletes lose some or all of their eligibility if they choose to remain at that school, but would keep all four years of eligibility if they choose another school.

Norris Coleman, a standout on the K-State men's team in the mid-1980s, had his eligibility challenged by the NCAA. The organization's original ruling said Coleman would have to sit out one year if he stayed at K-State, but could play immediately if he transferred, leading dozens of coaches to Manhattan to try to get Coleman's services.

In a situation more similar to Stiles', Cincinnati all-American Damon Flint signed a letter of intent with Ohio State. But when it became known the Buckeyes had violated NCAA regulations, Flint was released from his letter and signed with Cincinnati.

Wynn said she had no idea if the individual who called was the same person who placed the ad, and hoped it would have no effect on Stiles' eligibility.

"It would be sad if it did, because I certainly hope nothing would come of it," she said. "That's why we want to know who did it."

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

We will all breathe easier during today's smoke out

Today is the first day of the rest of your life.

Your non-smoking life that is.

Bet then you didn't know it was that big of a day when you rolled out of bed this morning, heated the coffee pot and reached for that pack of cigarettes. But you remembered that today is the day of the Great American Smokeout.

Good for you.

If you can do it today, why not try it for the rest of your life?

It will be considerably longer if you quit.

Sure, the urge will creep upon you a few times, but you're a strong person — certainly stronger than that death stick filled with nicotine and who knows what else.

Chew a little gum. A pack of gum is significantly cheaper than a pack of cigarettes — even the generic brands are getting pricey. And let's face it — if you're desperate enough to smoke the generic stuff, you've got a problem. Seek help.

Today is the day to re-evaluate your reasons for smoking.

Why not give up your oral fixation for an entirely new Freudian stage in your life?

Why on earth would you do that to your body, the environment and the bodies of those around you? It's not as though cigarettes taste great. It's not as though they really have any health benefits.

And they certainly don't do anything for aesthetics. They smell bad. They stain everything with a dingy, yellow tinge. And they don't compliment your cologne or perfume at all.

Habit? Maybe. But people have broken free of more gripping habits than that. Why would you let tobacco control you like that?

And there are probably very few people who would reject you from a date, a job or anything else because you don't smoke. But many people would not hesitate to exclude smokers from social activities.

So, today is the day to save your life and choose to live a healthier, longer life.

And everyone who loves you will breathe easier knowing you made the right choice.

WHY WE CARE

There are plenty of reasons to quit smoking today and for the rest of your life. Why not make the choice to live a longer, healthier life.

Bitterness doesn't go well with a turkey dinner

MY

Erin
MANSUR-SMITH

In fall 1978, my family gathered around the dining-room table for Thanksgiving dinner.

I still remember with great clarity the feast we had laid out. (When all I have in my cabinet is a can of tuna and some Cream of Wheat, I think back and drool.)

My mother had been up cooking at the crack of dawn, and her labors lay in front of us like a picture out of some gourmet magazine. There was turkey and homemade gravy, stuffing, yams and real mashed potatoes. There was cranberry sauce and at least five different kinds of pies, still warm and waiting on the back of the stove.

Everything gleamed, including us. We were all scrubbed up, dressed in our best and sitting with quiet, expectant looks on our faces as my father prepared to cut the turkey.

Halfway through the first slice, he put the knife down. My mother asked him what was wrong.

"I am a black man living in America," he said. "What the hell have I got to be thankful for?"

Ever since that day my family has never really celebrated Thanksgiving. Well, not in the conventional sense of the word.

We get together for the dinner my mother still wakes up in the wee hours of the morning to cook, but it's not like a Rockwell painting anymore. It doesn't have all the trappings it once did.

It was not my father's bitterness about race relations in the United States that changed the way the holiday was celebrated. At least, not directly. It was the fact that he introduced the idea that we all realized we had taken the celebration of Thanksgiving for granted.

We had gotten together to commemorate all our accomplishments, and the gifts we had received without really taking the time to remember where they had come from and what sacrifices had been made for us to receive them. We hadn't thought about how much still had to be accomplished.

My mother, always the genius, revamped the holiday following that incident. It was no longer Thanksgiving with my family. It became The Day of the Dead Feast. It sounds morbid but in all actuality it isn't at all. It is a day of quiet reflection on our ancestors and the sacrifices they made so that we might enjoy the freedoms we do.

Now, my family and I use the day to remember what so many people have died for and in the spirit of the first Americans, to express acts of good will to someone else.

For the most part, the reason we all celebrate Thanksgiving is to take stock of our lives and to use the day as a way of connecting with who we are and where we come from.

We spend it with our families or our friends. Some of us even spend it alone to take stock of ourselves and to reassess our priorities.

We eat, and we watch television or play football on the front lawn, taking out the time to spend with those we love whom we might not have been talking to lately.

> "It is about taking the time and the energy to stop and look around for a few minutes and to be appreciative for the gifts in our lives and also perhaps, to allow those gifts to touch the lives of others."

Some of us go to shelters to spend it with the homeless or battered women and children. Some of us spend it in hospitals or nursing homes, remembering "There but fortune go you or I" and rededicating ourselves to causes that are important to us.

Some of us choose not to celebrate it at all, not because we are not thankful for what we have, but because we don't need a day to remind us. We celebrate our gratitude every day in other ways.

No matter how we do or don't do the Thanksgiving ritual, the principle of it remains the same. Thanksgiving is about recognition. It is about taking the time and the energy to stop and look around for a few minutes and to be appreciative for the gifts in our lives and also perhaps, to allow those gifts to touch the lives of others.

We may feel angry or bitter because we are not all as free and as equal, as loved or as cared for as others. Things may not be going so well for us right now. We may despair we'll ever have any reason to be grateful.

But if everyone would just take the time — a day — to be kind to or to do something compassionate for another, Thanksgiving will never pass without feeling something to be thankful for.

KILLING TIME

The things we do in the name of staying awake during lectures

MY

Nikola
ZYTKOW

He was mysterious, intense — an older man.

I was young, impressionable.

Ahh yes, it's all coming back to me now.

Expository Writing I. 8:30 a.m. I sat at my little wooden desk, foggy glasses, a perm gone wrong. Waiting.

He usually got there a little late. Panting — like he'd just completed a 20-mile bike-a-thon. He'd stumble into the classroom. Blond ponytail swingin', black turtleneck clinging to his hard chest.

Oh, I could go on.

Before him, I was never particularly fond of my English professors.

Actually, he wasn't quite a professor. OK, so he wasn't even an instructor, merely a graduate teaching assistant. But if it were up to me, he'd be tenured in a second.

He encouraged us to make our writing personal, discussed papers with students at Espresso Royale Caffe and composed political poetry in his free time.

He was spontaneous — prone to leaping on a chair and shouting, "Carpe Diem" (like Robin Williams in "Dead Poets Society").

The last time I had a crush on the unattainable, it was Ricky Schroder on "Silver Spoons." Don't laugh! My bedroom walls were pasted with Tiger Beat posters of Ricky sitting on his scooter, Ricky petting his cat, and Ricky slicking back his hair.

Can a girl dream?

But getting back to my freshman-year love obsession.

The semester floated by like a sweet dream. Other than the occasional interruptions — Dickinson, Hemingway, Faulkner — I was left to my daydreams. Oh, it could have been so beautiful: He and I backpacking through Europe, drinking dark beer in smoky pubs and spending our nights on fast-moving trains.

OK, so I'm slightly strange. But I'm not alone. Aren't there plenty of others out there, spending their class periods doing things other than ardently listening to their professors?

Some of my most faithful readers wrote in about their personal classroom customs. And you thought I was bizarre? Check out these folks.

Instead of listening to my professor, I spend my time:

- Imagining what would happen if the doors were fused shut, and the entire class were trapped together. Who would we kill for food first? (Probably the instructor. Makes a better buffet.) Who would we kill for being annoying first?
- The crossword. I remember jotting down on a piece of paper such notes as "23 across?" and handing it to the woman to my left, who'd shrug and hand it to her left and so on. Finally seven seats down, in the little half-circle we'd formed with our desks, one person jotted down a reply, passed it back, and everyone who passed it looked at the answer with a nod of realization.
- Playing eye-tag. "Yeah. She looked at me. Let me glance back at her for just a second. Yeah. She wasn't looking. She must have been looking at me before. Yeah, that's it. She digs me."
- When I find myself drifting off, I'll begin to doodle and make sketches of my instructors doing something totally out of the ordinary. For example, while my natural-disasters instructor is lecturing about earthquakes, tornadoes or volcanoes, I might draw him doing something preposterous like bungee jumping from a volcano that is only moments away from erupting.
- After the Steelers lost the Super Bowl to Dallas, I couldn't concentrate in class for a week. I would drift off and think, "Hmm ... how could Neil O'Donnell throw two interceptions right to the man ... Was he paid off by the mafia? Is he on crack?"
- I observe the changing weather through the windows, play an electronic video game with the sound off and secretly listen to some music on a Walkman or a portable compact disc player.
- I write to-do lists that go like this: To do today: call professor about failing grade (while you're sitting in his class). I also get my best naps during class. Here's how: pick people with large hair and sit behind them. Next, open your book and spread out your notes like you are paying attention. Then tilt your head to one side and start snoring. You can achieve the best sleep this way because you are being lulled to sleep by your professor.
- When I'm bored by the droning sound of the professor's monotonous voice, I play number games with the clock or my watch: Let's see, it's 4:25. Four plus two plus five equals 11. Eleven is the square root of 121. At 1:21 today, I was eating lunch. For lunch, I ate a hot dog. It goes on from there, but I can play this game for hours.

A FINAL NOTE: For those of you dying to get some closure on my passionate preoccupation with Mr. Carpe Diem, you'll be pleased to know we're happily married. We never quite made it to Europe, but we did honeymoon in Rome, Georgia.

No. I can't lie.

He left before I had a chance to reveal my deepest desires. Now he's off teaching somewhere in New England, while I spend my nights staring at aging posters of Ricky Schroder.

Homeless a result of other problems

Editor,

I am becoming more aware of the homeless problem in American society. A lot is said about the homeless, but the media tend to overlook the causes such as alcoholism, drug abuse and mental illness. Shelters tend not to be up to par, and many don't provide substance-abuse services.

It's up to us to accept the truth and begin working to provide services to help these most unfortunate Americans break the cycle of homelessness.

Complaining won't change the laws against drinking during football games

Editor,

Sometimes things aren't exactly what they seem, and it appears to be this way here at K-State. This is because fans seem to think that if they cause enough ruckus, K-State officials will change things and let them have alcohol at tailgate parties.

I don't blame anyone for wanting this, but before anyone freaks out and gets angry I would like to explain why things aren't so bad and that it could be much worse.

First off, we all know that drinking does go on at every game and that it will always be that way. There is no way for the K-State Police to enforce something with so many fans at the games.

The campus police really don't even want to hassle with the problem in the first place. They have a job to do, but they are doing it because they have to.

Why do so many people complain about something that they are getting away with anyway? That doesn't seem to make sense. Everyone knows that people drink in the parking lot and it would be literally impossible to make it so that it doesn't happen anymore.

The campus police do what they have to do, they don't come looking for you. They make sure no one is causing trouble or anything like that, and if you are, then you will be in trouble.

Also they don't seem to bother anyone if you just have the alcohol in a cup. What are the campus police supposed to do, get dogs to go along and sniff everyone's cup?

I don't think so. So if you just don't cause trouble and drink out of your cup, you should be all right.

Students seem to forget that state laws don't allow alcohol to be consumed on public ground. I think that we would all agree that the parking lot is public ground. If there are to be any exceptions made, then certain things are required.

First, the place must be a non-academic place and secondly any alcohol allowed must be catered. I know that the parking lot is a place of higher learning, but just maybe we could fool a few people.

The rest of the requirement is something that I would personally like to see. I would like to see the only alcohol allowed in the parking lot to be catered.

OK, let's have the shot girls go around and sell drinks. That will happen about as quickly as President Clinton admits to inhaling.

In retrospect, I just wish that people wouldn't complain and realize that it isn't as bad as it seems. Maybe not everyone is happy with the way things are, but that is the way it is going to be whether we like it or not. In that case, let's just make the best of what we have and not try to worry about something that is not going to be changed.

K-State dining halls to serve annual Thanksgiving dinner

BETH HUSTED
staff reporter

All semester long it's been Kraft Macaroni and Cheese, Chef Boyardee ravioli and ramen noodles. It's time for a little home-cookin', but Thanksgiving is still a week away.

K-State students who live in the residence halls won't have to wait that long.

The dining halls will be having their annual Thanksgiving dinner tonight. The Thanksgiving meal at the residence halls is a special meal for students who live there.

"I think that we have an advantage. We are able to provide students their first Thanksgiving meal before they go home," said Mary Molt, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services.

There are additional costs associated with this meal because of the extra help needed and the extra decorations used in the halls and lobbies.

"We do three special meals each year: one for Thanksgiving, one for Christmas and one in the spring before finals," Molt said.

Students are allowed to have guests at any meal, but for these special meal, they must purchase tickets at least 24 hours in advance.

Shannon Montague, senior in advertising, said she remembers eating the Thanksgiving dinner when she was a freshman.

"I really liked the Thanksgiving dinner. It was much better than their usual food," Montague said.

Derby Food Center will be serving 13 whole turkeys, each weighing about 16 pounds.

The meal will also include 570 pounds of turkey breast, 325 pounds of drumsticks, 600 pounds of dressing and 20 gallons of gravy, Michelle Pickert, production dietitian for Derby, said.

Kramer Food Center will be serving eight whole turkeys, 280 pounds of turkey breast, 10 hams weighing 12-15 pounds each, 240 pounds of potatoes, 1,000 servings of dressing and about 300 servings each of pumpkin pie, apple pie and praline cheesecake, Sandy Procter, production dietitian for Kramer, said.

Van Zile Food Center will be serving 175 pounds of turkey breast, five whole turkeys, 70 drumsticks, 100 pounds of potatoes, 600 servings of dressing, eight hams, 600 servings of gravy, and 300 pumpkin pies, 240 apple pies and 220 praline cheesecakes.

The other special meals are aleady in the works.

"Our Christmas meal will be on Dec. 12 to give students that extra push before finals. The spring meal will be sometime in April," Molt said.

Fate of Farrell space still in question

SPEED

- Computing and Network Services is in the running to relocate to empty spce in Farrell Library's third and fourth floors and basement areas.

TARA WRAY
staff reporter

Speculation surrounds the fate of nearly 4,300 square feet of Farrell Library. However, one group has already staked a claim on the space.

According to a private memo sent from Vice Provost Beth Unger to Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock, a plan was outlined to appropriate the space in Farrell Library to Computing and Network Services.

Hobrock said the project has been in the works since the early stages of Farrell Library's expansion, although he said no official figures on space have been decided.

"Back about four years ago, the library defined basically all of the functions appropriate to these things," Hobrock said. "These things were incorporated at that time in the space-development plan."

The space in question would include areas on the third and fourth floors of the library along with areas in the basement of Farrell Library.

According to the Sept. 22 memo, possible divisions of CNS to be located at Farrell would include a Help Desk, an Instructional Assistance Center along with an Instructional Design Center.

Hobrock said despite the fact library space will possibly be allocated to another operation, it will be beneficial for both the library and CNS.

"I think it's one of the best things that could happen," Hobrock said, "assuming it is a University program developed corroboratively to benefit different users on campus."

Kenneth Conrow, associate director of CNS, said CNS operations have been scattered between several buildings on campus and a move to Farrell Library would be advantageous for them.

"We've been crowded for years," Conrow said. "It would certainly be nice to have some space in a central location."

Conrow said Farrell Library already houses a machine room, and that space would effectively be expanded to house new services.

However, George Keiser, professor of English, said with the lack of space available in other campus facilities, it's questionable as to why CNS was offered the space in Farrell Library. "Obviously, CNS needs space," Keiser said. "The question is, is the library the space they need to be in?"

Keiser said when there was no room left for expansion in the old library, the new addition was added to Farrell Library. He said now the question is when CNS moves in, how will that affect future expansions?

"Once these groups get settled in, you can't get them out with dynamite," he said.

Residence hall delegates attend conference, share ideas with other Midwestern schools

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

Some members of Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls and hall governing boards recently attended the Midwest Affiliate of College and University Residence Halls conference to share ideas for improving the residence halls.

Students from affiliate schools in the Midwest region attended this conference.

"All the schools in the nation that have residence halls are affiliated," Lillian Lancaster, junior in English, said.

This year's conference was Nov. 15-17 in St. Louis. The K-State delegation took 21 people.

Lancaster said the goal of the conference was for the delegates to learn what other schools do within their residence halls to improve things such as communication among residents.

Students were also able to place bids for leadership positions. Damon Sloan, graduate student in college student personnel and assistant residence life coordinator in Marlatt Hall, bid for and received the position of regional associate director of the National Residence Hall Honorary.

"The NRHH is the top 1 percent of residence-hall students, and their focus is recognition and leadership development of students," Sloan said.

Paul English, junior in history, bid for regional associate director of the Student Action Team, and he too received the position.

Students also present programs to demonstrate how to deal with issues such as AIDS and communication.

The K-State delegation presented seven programs, one of which was "You Rock Like a Grapefruit," presented by Jackie Koehler, sophomore in fine arts, and Shannon Totman, sophomore in business administration. It was a program about relationships and communication between the two genders.

This program placed in the top 10 programs at the conference.

Lancaster and English were also recognized for their outstanding service to the residence halls in the past four years.

"We've been crowded for years," Conrow said. "It would certainly be nice to have some space in a central location."

Conrow said Farrell Library already houses a machine room, and that space would effectively be expanded to house new services.

However, George Keiser, professor of English, said with the lack of space available in other campus facilities, it's questionable as to why CNS was offered the space in Farrell Library. "Obviously, CNS needs space," Keiser said. "The question is, is the library the space they need to be in?"

Keiser said when there was no room left for expansion in the old library, the new addition was added to Farrell Library. He said now the question is when CNS moves in, how will that affect future expansions?

"Once these groups get settled in, you can't get them out with dynamite," he said.

Residence hall delegates attend conference, share ideas with other Midwestern schools

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

Some members of Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls and hall governing boards recently attended the Midwest Affiliate of College and University Residence Halls conference to share ideas for improving the residence halls.

Students from affiliate schools in the Midwest region attended this conference.

"All the schools in the nation that have residence halls are affiliated," Lillian Lancaster, junior in English, said.

This year's conference was Nov. 15-17 in St. Louis. The K-State delegation took 21 people.

Lancaster said the goal of the conference was for the delegates to learn what other schools do within their residence halls to improve things such as communication among residents.

Students were also able to place bids for leadership positions. Damon Sloan, graduate student in college student personnel and assistant residence life coordinator in Marlatt Hall, bid for and received the position of regional associate director of the National Residence Hall Honorary.

"The NRHH is the top 1 percent of residence-hall students, and their focus is recognition and leadership development of students," Sloan said.

Paul English, junior in history, bid for regional associate director of the Student Action Team, and he too received the position.

Students also present programs to demonstrate how to deal with issues such as AIDS and communication.

The K-State delegation presented seven programs, one of which was "You Rock Like a Grapefruit," presented by Jackie Koehler, sophomore in fine arts, and Shannon Totman, sophomore in business administration. It was a program about relationships and communication between the two genders.

This program placed in the top 10 programs at the conference.

Lancaster and English were also recognized for their outstanding service to the residence halls in the past four years.

how LOUD can you get

STORY BY JEREMY KELLEY

Seating for Friday's basketball games will be a little different from normal to accommodate the planned Homecoming activities.

"Since this is primarily a student activity, we feel that the students should be the ones who have to bear the burden," Jim Muller, associate director at Bramlage Coliseum, said. "We hope that the students can bear with us for one game."

For Friday's game, greeks and residence-hall members will take part in one of the final activities of the week when they yell their loudest in the Pant the Chant competition.

"It's going to be a neat thing, and at least we will get people out of the cold," Muller said. "It has been a teeth-chattering chant for the last couple of years, because it has been so late in November."

In past years, this competition has been at KSU Stadium, but to accommodate the warmth of student competitors, the rally has been moved indoors.

"We have moved it inside, so it will be a little warmer," Muller said.

Muller said he liked having events planned in between basketball games, because he felt it would excite the students more.

"This will get everyone excited about football, basketball and Homecoming all in one event," he said.

Muller said when students start to arrive at the coliseum, they will be assigned to their specified seating.

"Ushers will be informed of where the student groups are to sit, and they will be directed in the right direction," Muller said.

Muller said students will sit in their assigned sections until Pant the Chant is through. After that, and before the men's game starts, students will be moved around to accommodate season-ticket holders.

"I don't see us dislodging season-ticket holders for this game," he said. "We feel that Pant the Chant people are mostly ticket holders."

Muller said he expected 2,500-3,000 students for the competition and pep rally. He said he felt he was prepared for the activity.

"We have worked really hard for this," Muller said. "We have been making announcements about this so everyone knows what's going on."

The doors for the women's game, which starts at 5 p.m., will be opened at 4 p.m. Student groups will be seated starting at 4:45 p.m. and will continue to be seated throughout the women's game.

Muller said students only need their student ID to get into the game.

"You can show a student ID to gain entrance, but when season-ticket holders start arriving for the men's game, students will be moved around," he said.

At halftime of the women's game, the residence-hall bodybuilding champion team will do its routine, while the fraternity/sorority champion will perform a version of cheerleading at halftime of the men's game. During the recess between the men's and women's games, the chanting competition will take place.

Muller said parking fees will start being issued at 6 p.m., and alumni parking spots will be reserved for those people.

"Our parking officials will protect reserve spaces for Ahearn and VIP donors," he said.

Kent Brown, K-State sports information director, said this chaos for the basketball game will not be a regular occurrence.

"It's going to be hectic because of Pant the Chant, but for this game it is the only way it could be done," Brown said.

K-State volleyball team to heat up Homecoming against No. 8 Texas

JOHN BERGOREN
sports writer

The K-State volleyball team will play No. 8 Texas at 7 tonight in Ahearn Field House in a game that was moved up from its originally scheduled time Friday because of Homecoming.

Texas comes into Manhattan with a 20-4 overall record, including a 14-2 conference record. Their two losses were at Nebraska and at Texas A&M.

The Wildcats come into tonight's match-up with a 22-7 record, 10-6 in conference play, and they boast a No. 24 ranking of their own.

K-State will be looking to get things back on track after last weekend's performances against Nebraska and Colorado when it dropped both matches in four games. K-State coach Jim Moore said, however, if his team plays as well as it did against Nebraska it will win tonight.

"If we play as well as we did against Nebraska, and if I could bet on the game, I'd put money on it that we would win," Moore said. "Nebraska proved that they are a better team than Texas earlier when they beat them three games straight."

In the schools' first meeting Oct. 26, Texas defeated K-State in three straight games. Moore said his team could surprise the Longhorns this time around.

"We were bad when we played them," Moore said. "I think that's a good advantage. We played so poorly against them I don't think they know what we can do. They'll be watching our tape, and we'll be watching the tape when we played them, and I'm hoping that that will help us."

The Wildcats are in desperate need of picking up a win tonight or in their next match on Saturday against Texas A&M if they want to compete in postseason play.

"I don't think we deserve to be ranked No. 24 in the nation right now," Moore said. "I think we have to win one of these games this week if we want to go the the NCAA Tournament."

Residence halls battle it out in volleyball; Moore topples in Marlatt at buzzer

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

It was a match of unbeaten residence-hall volleyball teams when Moore 7 squared off with Marlatt 5 Wednesday night in the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Both teams boasted a 3-0 record coming into the contest.

Jason Hoy, junior in civil engineering and Marlatt front-line hitter, said his team never had the same guys playing.

"We have to scrounge up guys on the floor to get a team," he said. "But we always have a pretty good one."

Marlatt was a little slow to start, because it had trouble finding one team member a pair of shoes.

"We have seven players and only six pairs of shoes. Figure that one out," Hoy said.

Marlatt came out of the gates running as the team members jumped out to a quick 7-2 lead in the first game.

"We are just an engineering floor. We are not a bunch of jocks, but we can play pretty well," Tyson Webster, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said.

Hoy said the team never practices, but rather, members get together and goof around.

"We have never practiced," Hoy said. "It's pretty much a free-for-all all of the time."

Marlatt easily controlled the first game over Moore and won the contest 15-5.

However, the tide changed for Moore Hall in the second game.

"We are not a real big bump-set-spike team," Eric Mink, freshman in microbiology, said. "We just basically go out and have fun."

The two residence halls switched leads throughout the second game, but it was the younger Moore who toppled the penalty-plagued Marlatt team 15-13.

"We would have won quick," Webster said. "But all those penalties killed us."

Marlatt came out of its third-game huddle chanting, "We got this, we got this."

Well, the team didn't get it. After jumping out to a quick 4-0 lead, Marlatt fell apart, and Moore took over.

"It took us a while to get into our game," Mink said. "What we do is just let the other team make the mistakes, and tonight it worked."

The final game was a long one. With time running down on the match clock, Moore won a barrage of points and tied the score at four with four minutes left.

"We work together well as a team," Justin Worthington, freshman in computer science, said.

Moore then controlled the match from there on out and as the final horn sounded won the match 9-8.

"We like close games," Mink said. "We have the most fun when we just play and let the other team make mistakes."

Marlatt, who fell to 3-1 on the season, said it is looking forward to hopefully facing Moore again in the finals of the residence halls.

"We about won, but about just wasn't good enough," Hoy said. "Hopefully we can see them in a few more weeks."

Weekend marks Wildcat sports at its biggest, best

Dan LEWERENZ

The time has come.

This weekend marks what might be the biggest weekend in the history of K-State sports.

Every showcase sport will be displayed prominently in the Little Apple between Thursday and Saturday. And some of those contests will be critical to postseason possibilities.

Homecoming is just a part of the overall picture. So paint yourself purple (that will be easier than going to the Laundromat and washing all your purple clothes), and get ready for the following schedule.

• THURSDAY: 7 P.M. The weekend begins in style when the Wildcat volleyball team plays host to the No. 8 Texas Lady Longhorns.

Texas is one of the nation's elite teams, advancing to the NCAA championship last year before falling to Nebraska.

The Cats didn't fare so well against the Lady Longhorns down in Austin. But part of Texas' advantage was the size and intensity of its crowd.

Last week, Wildcat fans, you achieved that all-star crowd status, pouring nearly 5,000 strong into Ahearn Field House for last week's face-off against Nebraska.

K-State has given many a valiant effort, and it's only a matter of time before that breakthrough win comes. Tonight might be the night.

"Point, Cats!"

• FRIDAY: 5 P.M. The women's basketball season opens Friday with the Cats taking on Memphis.

The Lady Tigers are predicted to take Conference USA, and some national polls (including Athlon's College Basketball and Sports Illustrated) by storm.

Honestly, not many will pick the Cats to win this game. Memphis beat us last year, and the Lady Tigers return more than 80 percent of their scoring.

But numbers can be deceiving. K-State will have the home-court advantage this time around, and a good crowd showing around the court combined with some solid defense on the court could just do the trick.

If K-State can hold its own against Memphis, it's a good sign. The Lady Tigers are one of the toughest teams the Cats will face this season.

If the Cats pull off the upset, it's monstrous.

• FRIDAY, 8 P.M. The men's basketball team opens its season against the Fighting Kangaroos of UMKC, also known as the 'Roos, or Mango Kanga.

(Actually, I just made Mango Kanga up. Maybe Hoop-along might be better.)

It's time to re-introduce freshman Pero Vasiljevic to his long-lost friends from down under.

Last time a bunch of Australians came to Bramlage Coliseum, the Cats came out on the losing end. But that was an exhibition game.

This time it's for real.

I want to see a packed house yelling, cheering, screaming and throwing the smaller members into the air. We need to get wild as we whoop that long kangaroo tail so hard it sticks out that silly pouch.

• SATURDAY: 1:10 P.M. K-State fans, are you ready?

K-State fans, are you ready?

Are you ready to cheer your team on to a 9-2 season record and a Cotton Bowl invitation?

Let's get ready to rumble!

Troy Davis leads the Iowa State Cyclones into KSU Stadium Saturday for the Cats' final game.

And I want to see a frenzy.

Davis needs just 40 yards to reach his second consecutive 2,000-yard season. And there's only one defense in the country that can stop him.

Two weeks ago, the Cats held Kansas' star running back, June Henley, to just 42 yards on the ground. That took inspired defense.

If K-State can keep Davis from reaching the 2,000-yard plateau, we might finally get the national recognition we deserve.

And while we're at it, do you remember the last time Iowa State was here? Bruiser Nyle Wiren caught up with Cyclone quarterback Todd Doxzon and planted him head first into Wagner Field.

Doxzon tried to pass it off as an attempt at a head stand. Wiren, after all, was only spotting.

That's the kind of gymnastics I want to see again.

• SATURDAY: 7 P.M. The weekend wraps up with the Cats again taking on a nationally ranked volleyball team, No. 14 Texas A&M.

This is another team that served up a loss when K-State last came a-callin'. It's time we return the favor.

There's not a team in the Big 12 we can't beat with the right game in front of the right crowd. I know you'll be here and in the spirit because of the football game.

So make sure you turn out for the final fight of the weekend.

A Cotton Bowl hangs in the balance this weekend. NCAA Tournament seeding hangs in the balance this weekend. The crucial first game for both basketball teams will be played.

So let's get out there, show off our pride and earn a set of Wildcat victories.

GO STATE!

They travel from all parts of the United States piled in their cars, trucks and buses forging through all types of weather. All to catch the next Phish show.

It's an exodus of Phish-heads.

"Forty-seven of us chartered a bus to get here," said Noel Dingboom, freshman undecided at the University of Colorado at Boulder.

"I looked out the windshield at one time, and it was completely white with snow."

Phish's Tuesday night Kansas City, Mo., performance was the last in a series of Midwest stops.

In the last week, the band played in throughout the midwest, including Ames, Iowa., St. Louis and Memphis, Tenn.

Many K-State students found themselves following the Vermont quartet show to show across ice-drenched highways.

All for a glimpse of Phish.

"Put simply, they're probably the greatest band I've ever seen. You never know what you're going to get. It's all in the vibe," Mike Kinsley, junior in architecture, said. "Every show is different."

Phish was formed in 1983 while the four band members were attending the University of Vermont.

The first official Phish performance was given at Slade Hall at UVM in October 1984.

The band's free-flowing concerts have attracted people to its shows ever since.

Some concert-goers drop out of everyday society and follow the band non-stop across the country. They sell fajitas, drinks, grilled-cheese sandwiches, beer or soda in the parking lots of the shows to support their Phish habit.

Others hold a cup and beg for change as the audience exits and enters the venue.

"I didn't expect so many people standing out on the street begging for tickets," Ryan Thomas, junior in graphic design, said.

"One girl said she'd lick the bottom of your shoe for a ticket."

Thomas said the Kansas City performance on Tuesday night was the first one he had attended.

"I came to see some good jamming," Thomas said.

The weather in Iowa and Nebraska last week made the traveling tough for some Phish-heads.

"Driving home that night the roads got bad, and we lost control and wiped out in a ditch. We had to stay in some podunk motel in the middle of Nebraska," Justin Leeper, junior in business, said.

"Otherwise the show was a blast."

People are listed by last name and by character's name.

Each character is also cross referenced with the Internet Movie Database.

What really sets this page off is its smooth, quick-loading graphic. It strikes just the right balance between being pleasing to the eye and download times.

The page is still under some construction, but it is worth a visit.

I list this site just for convenience. This is the official movie release site.

What is included is a discussion of the various technology on "Star Trek" and if such technology is possible.

It has ranked each marvel in order of possibility. The ship's computer is considered the most likely to occur. (I disagree, I think the computers will be much cooler.)

Wormhole interstellar travel and time travel are considered the least likely to occur. In between it discusses phasers, androids, replicators and even matter-antimatter engines.

I highly recommend this site.

CROP ART

Speaker makes fields a canvas for art

STORY BY ASHLEY WEEKLY

A newly plowed field is Stan Herd's canvas.

Herd is a crop artist. He transforms acres of land into images that can be best viewed by air.

"I am not presuming I will be the next Andy Warhol, but I'm doing what I like to do," Herd said.

Herd visited K-State Wednesday for the Lee A. Bryant Memorial Lecture Series on art and architecture through the College of Architecture Planning and Design.

Andy Miller, a third-year architecture student, said he related Herd's lecture to architecture.

"I learned that you can look at landscape differently. It is an awaking to what you can do with the land. It is not just hills and valleys," Miller said.

Herd was born in southwest Kansas. He now lives in Lawrence. He received an art degree from Wichita State University. Herd said that while living in Wichita he lost his focus on art.

"I didn't have money for a canvas, so I painted on a window shade with acrylic paints my mother gave me for Christmas. I entered it in a contest and won money. It helped remind me to get into art," Herd said.

Herd moved to Dodge City, where he was a well-known Western painter. After seeing a field just harvested he saw natural patterns in the land. Herd then thought of crop art.

"In just an instant the concept of using land as art popped into my mind," Herd said.

Herd's first work was of an Indian chief in 1976 using 160 acres. Herd said he became sympathetic to the Native American movement and has done several works for it since then.

In his 20 years in crop art, Herd said he has completed more than 15 images.

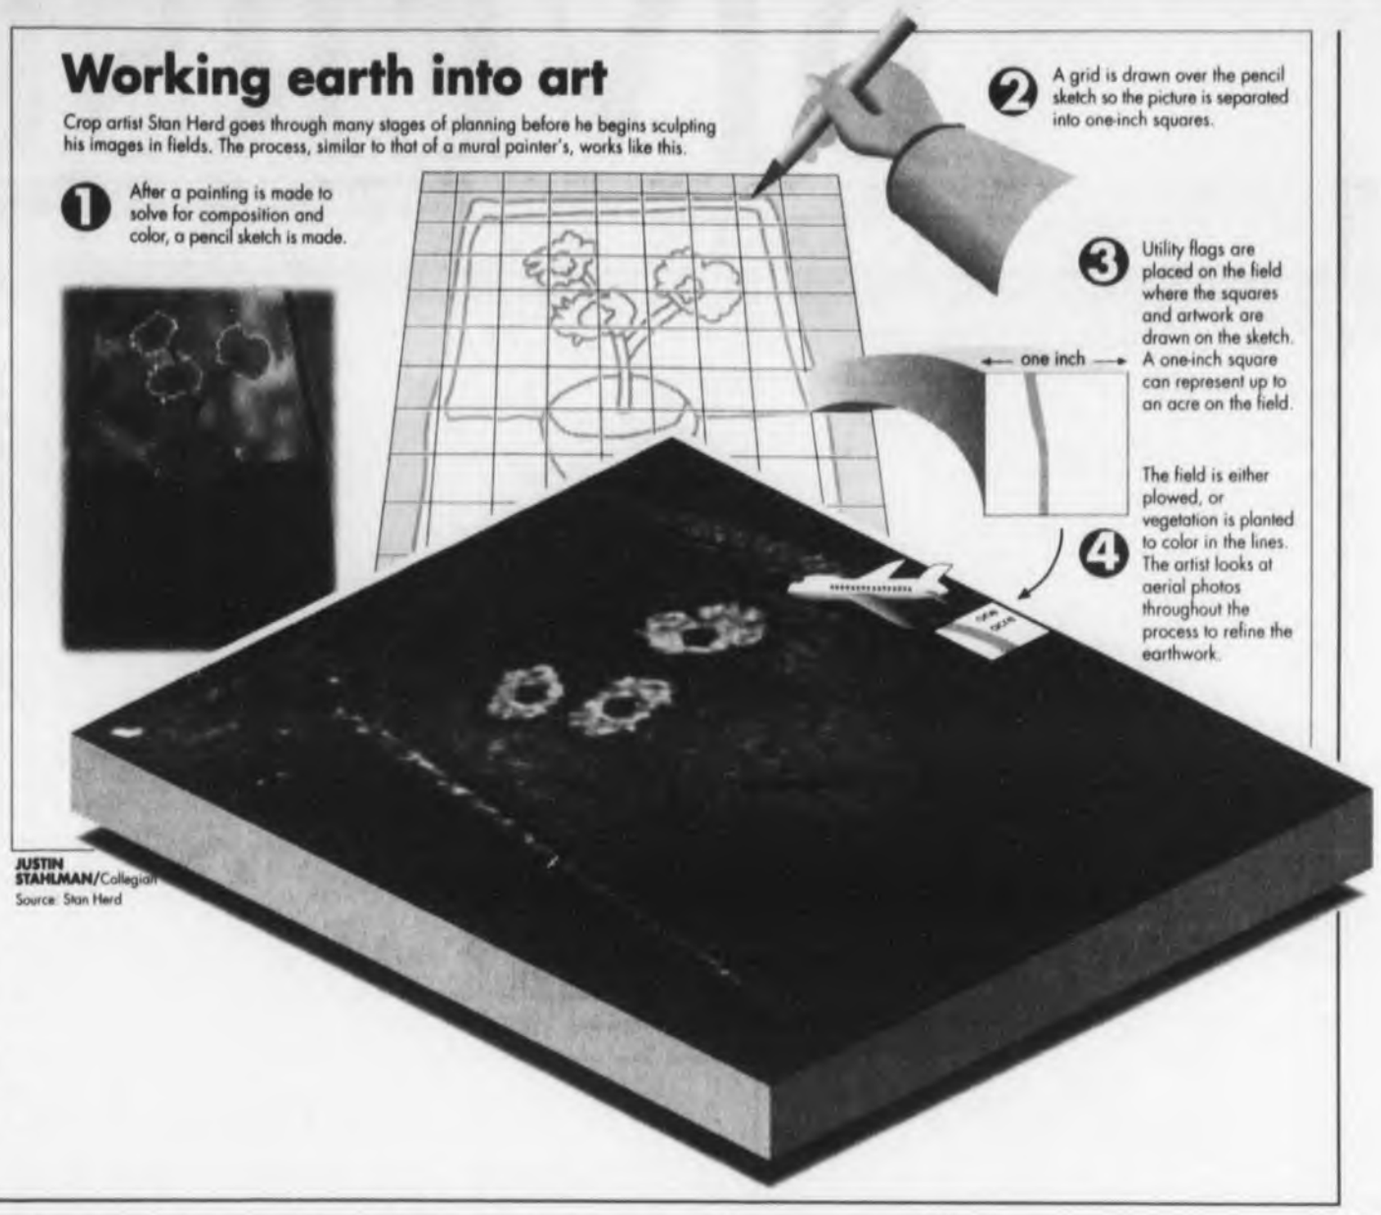
"Half of the works were commercial or endeavors where I had a client I needed to please," Herd said.

Herd's commercial works included an image for Absolut Vodka. He said in doing the ad he blurred the lines between commercial art and real art. He said he feels he sold out to do the ad.

"I try and balance my works between those that pay the bills and works that mean something to me," Herd said.

Herd said his most exciting and frustrating work was a piece done in 1992 on the west side of New York City. The land was owned by Donald Trump.

The work was admired by Herd because he said he liked the pristine landscape against an overgrown city. The work cost $90,000. Herd paid for the work by raising half and borrowing half. He also took out a mortgage on his house.



Some of Herd's other accomplishments included a cover for the magazine U.S. News & World Report. The image was of the Statue of Liberty. The work covered one acre of land and was completed in 12 days.

Herd begins his works by either drawing or photographing the image.

"I do a small drawing, and I might expand it and redesign it. The process is a system of manipulating images," Herd said.

He said the drawing breaks down the elements of the field.

Most of Herd's works only last a season. However, a few of them have lasted up to three years. Herd said the images change with the seasons and create different perspectives. Herd is currently working on an image in Abilene that will be permanent.

SMOKEOUT

Some K-State students said the desire to quit for the day was outweighed by daily problems.

"I was going to quit, but I found out I have a trig test, and that is stressful," Greg Slack, freshman in architectural engineering, said. "I might try to do it, but I don't know."

Slack said he had tried to quit before but had never been successful. He was interested in the smokeout day because he would not be quitting alone.

Karen Cowley, sophomore in arts and sciences, said she had agreed to quit for the day for Slack's benefit, although it wasn't a permanent thing.

"I haven't really given it much thought," Cowley said. "Greg wants me to do it with him, but I don't want to quit right now, even though I know I should."

Although many activities for smokeout day are aimed at smokers, a greater effort was made this year to target children before they begin the habit of smoking.

Because 90 percent of smokers claim to have started before they were 18, the American Cancer Society is sponsoring SmokeScream. Elementary students from across the United States are encouraged to scream out in unison against smoking today.

On the local level, the Manhattan Health Department sent out activities to all local schools. One of the activities is pumpkin carving so students can see the inside turn black when the candle is put inside.

Slack said with a few exceptions, the intense focus on the hazards of smoking is helpful to people trying to quit.

"Some people just enjoy irony, so they are going to smoke twice as much. Overall, I think it will be successful, though," he said. "Just the fact that other people are doing it too helps, because you're not the only one."

Beth Klobasa, social worker in the maternity and infant program for the Riley County/Manhattan Health Department, said the support people receive by quitting on smokeout day is part of what contributes to its success.

LIVESTOCK

The team won the contest against 38 other schools Monday in Louisville, Ky., naming it the national champion senior college team.

The team won two traveling trophies that will be displayed in Weber Hall.

The competing team's members were Blake Gamble, Skip Adams, Spencer Schrader, Jeff Nemecek and Cary Crow, all seniors in animal science.

Each of the competitors placed 12 classes of four animals, basing their decisions on the animal's records of confirmation, performance or both.

Contestants place classes of hogs, beef cattle and sheep. Each tries to come closest to the official placing, which is decided by a committee of judges.

In eight of the classes, oral reasons are given. Scoring is based on proper terminology, presentation and accuracy of reasoning.

Gamble said judging livestock entails a few requirements.

"It takes a good coach that knows livestock. As a person, you must be dedicated, because it takes long hours. It always helps if you have some livestock savvy," he said.

The team spent long hours preparing for the contest, practicing five days per week all fall and six days a week for the past month.

This contest is one of three largest contests most colleges enter, Gamble said. The others are the Mid-America Classic in Wichita, where the team placed second; and the American Royal Livestock Judging Contest in Kansas City, Mo., in which the team placed third last week.

Although Iowa State University and Oklahoma State University beat K-State at the American Royal, the team was able to get around them on Monday.

Schaake said what gave the K-State team an advantage over others was a class of market steers.

"We were prepared, and other teams weren't," he said. "The team was mentally prepared, and they all had a great day. In a sense, they all peaked at the right time and had their best performance all year."

In the individual placings, Nemecek was the second-highest individual overall. He also placed first in sheep classes and oral reasons. Gamble placed 10th overall.

Earnest said there are many benefits to judging livestock.

"It's so prestigious to be a member of a team — especially a winning one — that it's recognized by the industry and can help with future job opportunities," she said.

Formaldehyde levels not harmful to students, faculty

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

Formaldehyde levels in the cadaver room in Ackert Hall aren't too high, said Steve Galitzer, director of the Division of Campus Safety.

He researched the formaldehyde levels and said they seem to be OK for students and staff to be exposed to.

"So far, I don't have a dangerous situation," he said.

His research has shown the levels of formaldehyde in the air to be from 0.0 to 0.3 parts per million, which, according to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, is well below the .75 ppm-permissible level of exposure.

Archives

Looking for bac stories dealing with the formaldehyde problems? Check out the Electronic Collegian's archive at these sites: (http://collegian.ksu.edu/issues/v101/fa/no42/cam.cadavers2.corey.html) and (http://collegian.ksu.edu/issues/v101/fa/no37/campus.cadaver.corey.html).

Even though Galitzer said there was not a formaldehyde problem in the cadaver room, Jean-Pierre Perchellet said he disagreed.

Perchellet is a professor in the Division of Biology and instructor for Human Body — a class that uses the cadaver room. He said students and faculty shouldn't be inhaling formaldehyde vapors.

"Using toxic chemicals out of a fume hood is a total violation of the safety standards made by the University," Perchellet said.

In "Safety with Chemical Carcinogens in Research and Teaching," published by the Department of Public Safety, a rule stating "procedures shall be conducted in a laboratory hood or other suitable containment device when the procedure involves the use of volatile chemical carcinogens" is included.

The manual addresses but does not differentiate between potential and known carcinogens. A known carcinogen is known to cause cancer in humans, while a potential carcinogen, such as formaldehyde, is only known to cause cancer in lab animals.

"We think it (formaldehyde) might cause cancer, but we just don't know," Galitzer said.

Perchellet sees it another way.

"A carcinogen is a carcinogen," he said. Perchellet said because humans aren't experimented on with formaldehyde, it is hard to find out whether formaldehyde is a carcinogen.

Marlin Fitzwater, a K-State alumnus, returned to K-State to deliver the 108th Landon Lecture — appropriately during Homecoming week.

COMING HOME

KELLY FURNAS
staff writer

Marlin Fitzwater, the first K-State alumnus to deliver a Landon Lecture, spoke of the changing role of the media in today's society in the 108th lecture Thursday morning in McCain Auditorium.

Fitzwater, press secretary for presidents Reagan and Bush, also gave insight to political happenings now and during his tenure as press secretary.

> "Fifty percent of my stories are about Republicans and 50 percent are about Democrats. It's just that the ones about Democrats are funnier."

"Today, I'd like to talk about the two institutions I have known best — the media and the presidency," he said. "And there's no better time to talk about the presidency than after an election."

Fitzwater told the 900 audience members that he understood there was no political bias in the crowd.

"Fifty percent of my stories are about Republicans and 50 percent are about Democrats," he said. "It's just that the ones about Democrats are funnier."

President Clinton was one topic of Fitzwater's lecture.

"The question everyone is asking is, 'Where is Bill Clinton going?'" he said. "Where does he want to take the country?"

The president should be careful,

Fitzwater, who served under Presidents Reagan and Bush, is the first K-State alumnus to deliver a Landon Lecture. Fitzwater graduated from K-State in 1965. Both Reagan and Bush have been speakers for the lecture series, which is named after the late former Kansas Gov. Alf Landon who ran for president against Franklin Delanor Roosevelt.

Traffic stop results in marijuana find

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — Marijuana with an estimated street value of $100,000 was confiscated early Thursday after a Kansas Highway Patrol trooper stopped a vehicle for alleged speeding.

The stop

WHEN:	4:30 a.m. Thursday
WHERE:	Junction City exit ramp at I-70
AMOUNT:	38 bricks (121 pounds) of marijuana
VALUE:	$100,000

The vehicle was supposed to have been rented to a female, the patrol said. There was no female in the machine. The driver was carrying a license that had been suspended.

The patrol impounded the vehicle shortly after the traffic stop at 4:30 a.m. on an exit ramp off I-70.

A crime dog, Argus, discovered a large cache of marijuana in the rear of the vehicle, the patrol said.

Carlos Roman, Geary County sheriff's detective, said the search turned up 38 bricks of marijuana with a total weight of 121 pounds.

Three men in the vehicle are being held in the Geary County Detention Center.

The three men face probable-cause charges including driving on a suspended license, speeding, and possession of marijuana with intent to sell or sale of marijuana, Roman said.

They are expected to make a first appearance in Geary County District Court later today.

CHARLES REAGAN, assistant to the president, visits with Marlin Fitzwater, former White House press secretary, on their walk to the K-State Student Union for lunch Thursday after the Landon Lecture.

Fitzwater tours his alma mater

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

Marlin Fitzwater said he likes to come to Manhattan and walk around the K-State campus, soaking up the atmosphere at his alma mater without anyone's knowing he is in town.

The former White House press secretary couldn't get away with that when he came to campus to speak for the Landon Lecture Series.

He whisked from building to building, meeting with groups of alumni, faculty and students.

After the lecture, he was ushered to the K-State Student Union for the patron's luncheon, where he amused and informed the Landon Lecture supporters with anecdotes about working for presidents Reagan and Bush.

"The old Gipper knew about cameras, and he didn't often get caught — even though I often did," Fitzwater said.

He said he recalled telling Reagan to take the phrase "tear down that wall" out of a speech for former Soviet Union President Mikhail Gorbachev, only to be overruled by the president.

"Now the wall is down, and I'm no longer working for the government," Fitzwater said with a smile.

K-State president Jon Wefald concluded the luncheon by presenting Fitzwater with a silver platter engraved with a picture of Anderson Hall.

The audience laughed at this, remembering Fitzwater's earlier comments about his days at K-State.

"Spread the word: The president of the University said I was a great guy," he had said. "I never set foot in Anderson Hall unless I was in trouble."

Fitzwater then proceeded downstairs in the Union to the bookstore, where he signed copies of his book, "Call the Briefing! Reagan and Bush, Sam and Helen: A Decade with Presidents and the Press."

Finally, he crossed the street to Kedzie Hall, where he met with students

A preventable disease is taking the lives of our family members, friends, classmates and neighbors.

Through education and service, students can join the fight against AIDS.

Awareness, education and support are ways the Manhattan AIDS Project Inc. is fighting the disease. MAP is a non-profit organization, serving Riley County and surrounding areas for the past three years.

• VOLUNTEERS MAKE MAP POSSIBLE

Volunteerism is the foundation of the organization. Jan Trulson, chairwoman of the Awareness Committee, said MAP is run entirely by volunteers.

Volunteers have founded the organization's board of directors, formed committees, organized fundraising and provided support for MAP clients.

"About 25 volunteers are students," she said.

K-State faculty and staff members also work with MAP. The number of volunteers changes each semester.

"Students graduate, they go home for summer and don't come back, or we just lose them," Trulson said.

Trulson said volunteers are able to work in the areas they like.

"We have client services, which involve transportation, becoming a buddy, doing housecleaning, cooking a meal for a client — things of that nature," she said.

To volunteer, Trulson said, people must go through MAP training. The training ensures volunteer comfort. Clients then will also be comfortable with the volunteer transporting them to doctors' appointments or even taking them shopping, she said.

MAP volunteers work with the case manager to determine when a client may need transportation or a buddy. Pauline de Vaudreuil, case manager, works directly with clients. She meets clients to assess their needs.

"They may need a support group, financial help or help with disability paperwork," she said. " I let them know what our resources are."

Although numbers fluctuate, de Vaudreuil said MAP serves nine clients.

Ray, a MAP client and former K-State student who asked his real name not be used for privacy issues, said he first received help from MAP with his

• NICHOLSON INDICTED IN RUSSIAN SPY CASE. Career CIA officer Harold J. Nicholson was indicted Thursday on a charge of selling national defense information to the Russians since 1994 for more than $180,000. The one-count indictment, returned by a federal grand jury in suburban Alexandria, Va., charged the 46-year-old former CIA station chief with conspiracy to commit espionage. The charge carries a top penalty of life in prison without parole.

• CISNEROS TO LEAVE CABINET. Housing Secretary Henry Cisneros said Thursday he will leave the Cabinet, the seventh in a string of advisers who won't be staying for President Clinton's second term. Cisneros did not provide a reason for his departure, although he has said he might need to seek a higher-paying job outside government. Half the members of Clinton's 14-person Cabinet have now indicated they will be leaving.

• TELESCOPE BEGINS OBSERVATIONS. An ultraviolet telescope orbiting behind space shuttle Columbia observed stars hotter and more massive than the sun after scientists fixed alignment problems Thursday. Researchers spent Wednesday trying to determine the degree of misalignment on each of three instruments on the telescope.

• SIMPSON TO TAKE STAND. Sometime-actor O.J. Simpson will embark on the performance of his life when he testifies in the civil trial today. The audience will be a jury of his peers, his critics and the court of public opinion. Jurors in Simpson's murder trial got only three words from the celebrity defendant. Jurors in his wrongful death trial may get three days.

• GUNMAN TO SPEND LIFE IN PRISON FOR MASSACRE. A judge ordered a gunman to spend the rest of his life in prison Friday for killing 35 people in an April shooting spree at a Tasmanian tourist spot. Chief Justice William Cox handed down 35 life sentences against Martin Bryant in the Tasmanian Supreme Court, which was packed with relatives of the dead and survivors of the massacre. The judge said Bryant would never be eligible for parole. Australia has no death penalty.

• EXPLOSION IN PUERTO RICO. The shops and restaurants were just opening on crowded Camelia Soto Street when an explosion blew apart a six-story building Thursday, turning windows into flying knives and crushing drivers in their cars. At least 20 people were killed, and more than 80 were hurt. Police expected to find at least 10 more bodies in the mounds of torn steel and concrete that were offices and apartments. Officials suspected a leak in a pipe carrying cooking gas caused the blast, and said the building's owner had been complaining for weeks of escaping gas.

• ISRAELIS ACCUSED OF BEATING PREGNANT PALESTINIAN WOMAN. A Palestinian police officer and his pregnant wife accused Israeli troops Thursday of barging into their home and beating the woman unconscious. The couple said Israeli police accompanied by an army intelligence officer arrived at their home in Hebron on Tuesday morning and accused them of keeping weapons in the house illegally. Itaaf Abu-Mayyaleh, 30, said the police ignored her cries that she was pregnant and beat her for half an hour, insisting she was hiding weapons. Five of the seven Abu-Mayyaleh children were in school at the time.

• JUDGE BARS ACCESS TO NICHOLS' PHONE CALLS. A federal judge today barred the FBI and federal prosecutors from access to tapes of telephone conversations Oklahoma City bombing suspect Terry Nichols had with his wife and son while in prison. Nichols' attorneys had objected to access to the records by investigators, saying it violates Nichols' civil rights. Nichols could face the death penalty if convicted of federal conspiracy and murder charges in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building.

A two-part version of Truman Capote's book "In Cold Blood," published in 1965, will air Sunday and Tuesday evening on CBS.

• FARLEY SUSPENDED FROM NEBRASKA. Nebraska linebacker Terrell Farley allegedly hit two parked cars and tried to run away before he was arrested early Wednesday for the second time this year on suspicion of drunken driving.

Farley was suspended from the team and will be dropped from the squad if he is found guilty, coach Tom Osborne said. He said the team had tested Farley for alcohol usage daily since a preseason drunken-driving incident, and Farley had tested clean.

One of college football's top defensive players, Farley was booked about 1:15 a.m. on suspicion of drunken driving, refusing to take a test for alcohol levels, speeding, driving with a suspended license, leaving the scene of a property damage accident and resisting arrest.

The 21-year-old senior did not struggle with police but tried to run away before he was arrested. Police said his blood-alcohol level was 0.177 percent. The legal limit in Nebraska is 0.10 percent.

• LANGLEY DEAD AT 68. Elmo Langley, a long-time racer and most recently a NASCAR official and pace-car driver for the Winston Cup series, died today at Suzuka General Hospital of apparent heart failure. He was 68.

Langley, who lived in Harrisburg, N.C., experienced chest pains during a test drive and was rushed to the hospital where he was pronounced dead.

His heart had stopped before he arrived at the hospital.

His NASCAR driving career lasted from the late 1950s until the early 1970s and included two wins in NASCAR's top stock car division.

Greek division battles for bodybuilding title

- Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha
- Kappa Kappa Gamma/Lambda Chi Alpha/Tau Kappa Epsilon
- Pi Beta Phi/Sigma Lambda Gamma/ Alpha Tau Omega
- Alpha Xi Delta/ Delta Tau Delta/ Phi Gamma Delta
- Sigma Kappa/ Sigma Alpha Epsilon/ Sigma Phi Epsilon

The Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team took first place in the greek division of the bodybuilding competition, adding 80 points to the team's Homecoming total.

A blast of techno tunes filled Ahearn Field House while the five finalists for bodybuilding competed Thursday night.

The competition didn't start until 5:30 p.m., but by 5 p.m., the rafters were full, and teams were already showing their school spirit. They used this time to outshout, outstomp and outcheer each other.

"This event is so exciting and so important to everyone. For some people, this is their one event to shine. They may not participate in anything else this week. That's why there's so much time and energy put into this," said Cherlyn White, senior in public relations and member of the Kappa Kappa Gamma/Lambda Chi Alpha/Tau Kappa Epsilon team.

Each team performed its routine, and by 6:30 p.m., everyone was eagerly awaiting the announcement of the winners.

The bodybuilding event is one of many events in which groups participate during Homecoming week. Teams earn points for the various events, and points are added up to determine the overall Homecoming winners.

"Every team that participates in bodybuilding receives at least 15 points, but the first-place team earns 80. It makes a difference," said Kori Keeton, senior in political science and president of Panhellenic Council.

Crista Simnitt, junior in marketing, was a member of the first-place team.

"I'm completely speechless. The energy level we had tonight was incredible. We basically performed an entirely different routine because of it. The excitement from tonight will definitely keep us pumped through the rest of the week," she said.

The Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team will perform its bodybuilding routine at halftime of the K-State men's basketball game tonight. The Strong Complex team, which won the residence-hall bodybuilding division Wednesday night, will perform at halftime of the women's basketball game tonight.

The overall winners of Homecoming week will be announced during halftime of the K-State vs. Iowa State football game Saturday.

Swine Day attracts pig enthusiasts

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

Pig producers from across the state came to K-State Swine Day to learn new research and industry trends. More than 750 swine enthusiasts spent Thursday at the Holidome learning tips on how to make their swine operations more profitable.

K-State was host to the programs and helped the Kansas Pork Producers' Council celebrate its 40th anniversary.

Chris Hurt, agricultural economist at Purdue University, was the day's featured speaker. Hurt explained how producers can stay competitive in today's pork business.

"Now is the time to lay the groundwork for change. It won't happen overnight," Hurt said. "You can't just expand what you're presently doing, because you don't get the new technology."

Joe Hancock, K-State swine nutritionist, said removing vitamins and minerals from late-finisher diets can save money without decreasing performance or meat quality of high-lean pigs.

"Omitting the pre-mixes did not result in fat carcasses with poor meat color or quality. There weren't many differences at all," Hancock said.

The next speaker was Bob Goodband, professor in animal science and industry, who discussed alternative feed ingredients in grower and finisher diets. Some of the alternatives he talked about were wheat midds, barley, triticals and genetically engineered corn.

"You can add just about 10 percent of anything to a finishing pig diet, even potato chips," Goodband said. "But it's still pretty hard to beat a milo-soybean-meal-based diet."

Other speakers focused on determining growth curves on the farm, new developments in amino-acid needs for finishing pigs and the effect of gestation feeding on performance.

After those programs, a poster session followed. The posters and mini-research presentations presented graduate-student research projects.

A report-of-progress book was published to supplement Swine Day and the lectures. The book is available through the K-State Agricultural Experiment Station.

More than 60 businesses participated in a trade show that ran throughout the day. The show brought new products and technology to producers.

Rhonda Ward, senior in animal science and industry, said she came to Swine Day to learn something she can take back to the swine operation she works for and to possibly meet prospective employers.

"You never know who you're going to meet," Ward said. "Your future boss could be here walking around."

Gas industry to build lab in Salina

BETH HUSTED
staff reporter

K-State professors and students in engineering will be spending more time in Salina.

K-State will be helping design and install the National Gas Machinery Laboratory on the K-State-Salina campus.

Ten K-State students, 10 K-State-Salina students and three K-State professors of engineering are in the process of designing and conducting research for what will go into the building. The building is on the K-State-Salina campus.

"The project is receiving a lot of support from K-State, industry, state government and Kansas Technical Enterprise Corporation. We want this to be a world-class laboratory," said Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering.

After several changes in policies occurred for the natural-gas industry, the need for a laboratory such as this one became necessary.

First, the Clean Air Act amendments made in 1990 required the gas industry to reduce and monitor its pollution emissions.

Second, according to information from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, natural-gas pipeline companies would no longer operate as regulated monopolies, and they will have to compete by allowing open access to their pipelines.

Current gas-industry leaders do not have the revenue to build their own laboratories.

"We hope it will become the research and testing facilities for the gas industry so they can meet those regulations," Kirby Chapman, professor of mechanical engineering, said.

The laboratory will help test turbochargers for efficiency and compatibility with certain engines.

The site at Salina was ideal for the laboratory's purpose. The campus was built on an old Air Force base.

"We will be running jet engines, and nobody would want that in a neighborhood. We can make a lot of noise there and not worry about it," Chapman said.

The building provided for the laboratory will require about $150,000 in modifications to make it suitable. Having to build a brand-new building for the laboratory would have cost close to $500,000.

"We hope to have the first test cell operational by May 1997," Chapman said.

Students working on the project will be able to get hands-on experience and also be able to apply what they are learning to their thesis. The program includes engineering from freshmen to seniors.

Students who are interested in more information should stop by Durland 301.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Students' suggestions will be beneficial to all

WHY WE CARE

Students can now report when they can't understand a teacher — either conceptually or linguistically. This is helpful to students and teachers.

University administrators need to be applauded for communicating with students and getting input on teachers' effectiveness in the classroom.

Through the provost's office, students will be able to report teachers who are difficult to understand, either because their English skills are not fully developed, or they are not explaining the class' concepts well enough.

This teacher-reporting system will be beneficial to both students and teachers.

For the students, they will be able to get more effective teaching and instruction and will therefore get more out of their education.

Teachers who are having problems communicating concepts to students — whether it be a language or instructional barrier — will be given training and suggestions from other professors and linguists to help solve the problem.

Students will then be better educated, and their teachers will be better teachers and more able to get across the concepts they're tryin to teach.

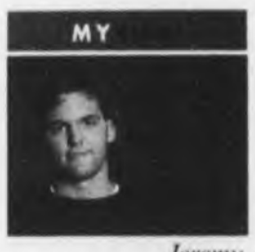
This concept is not a new one. Students could always report problems with teachers, but the provost's office has now given us a more uniform method of doing so.

This will give students more responsibility and say-so in their education. It is a responsibility that should not be abused by those who will complain out of bitterness from not passing a test.

Students can go into the provost's office to report any problems with understanding an instructor.

The provost will then sit in on the instructor's class to find out if the student has a valid concern.

If there is only one student complaint, the provost's office will attempt to solve the problem by rearranging the student's schedule.



This system of checks and balances will help weed out students who are simply using the complaint as an excuse as to why they are not passing their class.

It will ensure that both the teacher and the student are treated fairly.

Cheaters never win anyone's respect

MY

Jeremy STEPHENS

Life is more than a spades game.

Last Sunday night, the Union Program Council put on a spades tournament, known as the Second Annual Spadestacular.

Just think, if someone with a deep voice said "Second Annual Spadestacular" it would sound really important.

However, I don't know anyone with a deep voice.

Anyway, UPC did a good job of putting it on, and except for a rule that stated a game consisted of two hands, it got off to a good start.

To the guys who won the tournament, let me say congratulations.

I was hoping the guys who came in second would have won, because they beat my partner and me for our first loss.

There is something oddly satisfying about losing to the eventual champion.

From spades to basketball, if a team loses to the eventual winner, the members will inevitably go home and tell their friends, "At least we lost to the guys who won the whole thing."

This is said proudly, as if losing in this manner is more distinguished than losing to the third-place team. Let me be the first to say you still lost.

Of course, I would say the same thing. We all would.

The tournament was double-elimination, so after losing to the eventual runner-ups, we had to play a second team.

They seemed like nice guys at first, but by the time the game was over, my partner and I had a different opinion.

They cheated.

From nodding to each other across the table about which card they should play, to spading a certain suit one hand and suddenly having it the next time it appeared, to getting up and walking around the table in the middle of the hand, it soon became apparent how the game was going to be played.

Unfortunately, we didn't protest the game because it didn't become apparent what they were trying to do until after the game.

I guess you could say we trusted they would play fair.

We were wrong.

I have never met these people before, and probably will never see them again. But if I do, I will always think of them as the people who had to cheat to win.

The odd thing is that how you do the small things, such as playing a spades game, can be such a determinant of the big things, such as how you live your life.

And while these guys probably don't get around in life by acting this way, that is what their actions said, and there is little that can be done to reverse my perception.

And yes, some of you might say that I'm being harsh, that I'm judging too quickly, or that I don't understand the whole picture.

And I could say I jumped to a conclusion too quickly, or I read the situation wrong.

But we'd both be lying.

I'm being honest when I say I don't respect them anymore.

I don't think anyone would.

To the guys we played, I don't mean to belittle you.

The way that the game was played caused me to think of some things that were bigger than the spades game.

Such as life.

In the big picture, that spades tournament was nothing. In five years, they probably won't remember anything about it. I won't either.

But I will remember that I can't trust the guys we played.

This is unfortunate, because they probably don't make it a habit to play that way or even live their lives that way.

But when the pressure was on, they gave in and did what it took to win the game, even though that meant cheating.

To me, the spades game was a little thing. The big thing was just to have a good time, meet some new people, and hang out with my spades partner, who is also my friend.

Spending time with her was much more important than whether we won the game or not.

Live your life in such a way that people don't doubt your credibility.

I am far from perfection on this issue, but I have realized what it takes to restore it.

It's not worth raising doubts about your integrity to claim victory.

Winning isn't everything.

Never was.

Never will be.

SWEATING the DETAILS

MY

Rhett HARTMAN

The details, the details, the details are important. For some reason or another, this point has subtly popped up in my recent life's goings on.

In talking with one of the surviving history doctoral students, I learned how something as small as a detail can change this thing we call the big picture.

In chit-chatting with an architectural friend of mine, the prominence and necessity of details were shown to be critical in all forms of art and expression. Really.

Take a bridge, for example. In building a bridge, details are important. If architects are being critiqued on the purpose of the bridge, they ought to have a reason for why they chose the specific type of structure that supports the bridge.

They can't very well say, "It just felt like the thing to do." This is not an attitude that will keep structures standing. Of course, this anal thinking is directly related to the reason behind architecture. But what about a less structured and dynamic art, such as a painting?

Impressionist artists are not too interested in details. Their painting is nothing but a bunch of splotched paint — or so it seems. If such an artist would be critiqued on a painting, the question "Why did you make that particular brushstroke?" wouldn't be important.

But, if asked enough times, these brush strokes could eventually make up a distraught tear-stained face. In this case, the specific details might alone be unimportant, but in context and together, they are the essence of what art is.

Yet this art does not attempt to turn itself into a reality, such as the will of an architect or engineer does. When this crucial transformation is made, the details become so very important. Because paintings are not meant to be models for a thing in reality, this keeps us from needing to care about the details about it.

On the other hand, a structure, such as a building, will stand even if there is no consideration for aesthetics. In this sense, only the details and the specifics of the building are considered.

In this sense, form follows function. And when designed only with minute details in mind, the building becomes unlivable. Sure it stands, but when it lacks a consideration for the big picture, such as aesthetics, it doesn't coordinate at all with the lives of those who live there.

What this attitude does is remove the structure of the house from its context, or this hackneyed big-picture deal. The house was created with certain ideas, and if the context of where it lives is not in line with these ideas, then it will not survive. If this big picture is so important, what exactly is it?

> "Details have brought about much change, and those who do not want to change care little for these details."

I see the big picture as change. Change from one place to another. From one person to another. From parents to children. From the past to the present to the future.

This change is the separator between what works and what doesn't. When people settled in the United States, the idea that the weak should be enslaved has not survived all of the changes in culture and economics that have happened since Europeans came to North America.

So what this is saying is that the changes in U.S. society were responsible for destroying the idea that slavery was good and should happen. The changes brought out the reason why slavery is wrong.

Before this transition, slavery was not seen as an immoral thing. This is an important perspective to understand. It exists because the details exist, and the details describe what does and what doesn't change with time.

Details have brought about much change, and those who do not want to change care little for these details. Imagine the details that had to be discovered for computers to exist.

These details are hidden to the average computer user. Most people born before 1970 consider this technology a change. They responded to computers much like my generation will respond to video telephony. The details of change are usually hidden, and this is the crux of all problems.

Unless change stops happening, the solution to conflicts within social and personal relationships and academic and family matters will always root itself in the details. Have a good look where the reason lies, and you will find the details have followed.

Rape victims carry the emotional pain with them forever

GUEST

Charle Sioux CHARLETON

I lost a lot of sleep last night. I was angry and ended up mentally writing this column.

In Monday's Manhattan Mercury I read a short report regarding yet another K-State student had reported a rape. That makes two in one week.

I thought how stupid those girls are to be so trusting. Then I realized I was blaming the victim. A woman should have the right to trust people.

So the question I am now asking is this: What gives some men the idea that just because they have a piece of meat between their legs they can treat women like shit?

I am sorry if I offended some of you people by being crude, but rape is a crude subject. And it's not just rape, mind you.

Where do some guys get the idea that, just because they are guys, they can smoke their old ladies? Women are verbally, physically and mentally abused.

And you know what happens? They get scared and sometimes — often — they don't stand up for themselves. Now, why is that?

Is there a bigger underlying societal message here that still says keep your mouth shut and nobody gets hurt? Are we still telling women to be good little girls?

And while we're at it, let me dispel a few myths about rape. First of all, they aren't myths. They are lies.

Nobody is asking for it, regardless of how she looks or acts or dresses. And the old line about why doesn't she just lay back and enjoy herself is another lie.

How can a person enjoy losing her dignity and her sense of self-worth? How can something so intimate be turned into something so violent — and yet we are told to just lay back and enjoy it.

There is nothing enjoyable about violence, and rape is about violence. It is not a crime of passion or lust or love. Rape is a crime of violence, usually perpetrated by a man toward a woman.

It's not fun, it's not funny, and it's no laughing matter. And the sad thing is, more rapes are not reported than are.

Why is that you might ask? Even in this great age of enlightenment, rape is a terrible thing. The idea of going to the hospital, going to the police and possibly going to court is overwhelming.

Once a women is raped, she loses all sense of self. She loses her courage, and she lives in fear.

You've already been betrayed by someone who took advantage of your trust. Now you are supposed to turn your life over to strangers? I don't think so.

I applaud all the women who have been through what I consider the worst thing that can happen to a woman and still stand up for themselves.

I know it is not easy. You no longer know whom to trust or where to turn.

You are afraid and ashamed, even though you are not the person who committed the crime. You want people to know what a terrible thing happened to you, but you are afraid to tell them.

And you know why? Because people still blame the victim. With all the support there is, that old mentality still exists.

How do I know? Because men are still raping women. But I think women are fighting back more now. At least I hope so.

I was raped a long time ago. There were no crisis centers. Doctors were less understanding.

My doctor knew what was going on, probably because of the bruises. I fought back. Until the guy threatened to have his buddies come in and help hold me down.

Then I turned into the perfect victim. Afterward, I ran out of the apartment, grabbing my shoes and purse. It was raining. I was stoned and scared.

I went to a gas station and called a cab. I went home and took a long, hot bath. The only reason I even went to the doctor was because I was scared of getting a sexually transmitted disease.

I found out later the guy's wife had a baby girl the same day he attacked me. In his own house, in his own bed. I always felt sorry for his wife and daughter.

Of course, I didn't press charges. I was a cocktail waitress, which some people automatically classified as a tramp. I was wearing a short dress, which would make some people assume I was asking for it. And I was there with my friend who was buying marijuana, which really complicated matters.

I didn't get counseling, and for a long, long time, I jumped out of my skin whenever someone approached me from behind. I got over it. If someone tried to mess with me now, all that anger I pushed way down inside me would explode, and they would get hurt worse than I did.

But a little bit of that anger seeped out last night and kept me awake long enough to mentally write all this. What's the point, you might be saying.

Well, here's my point: To all you violent guys out there and maybe to any guy out there, I'm asking you to think.

When you go home for Thanksgiving, look at your sister, your mother, your grandmother. Think about what it would be like if someone hurt her.

I was in my 20s when I was raped. By the age of 25, I was a mother, finally. Now I am a grandmother. But I was still raped, and it is still a part of who I am.

I'm not saying all guys are rapists or abusers or hateful toward women. Don't get me wrong.

I'm just saying we all need to be a little more sensitive toward the people we hurt. And toward the people like me who hide the hurt inside.

The next time one of you guys (and you know who you are) looks at a woman and thinks about getting her drunk or getting her high or just getting her — think again.

Someday that 18-year-old woman you hurt will be a mother, if she's lucky, and it's what she wants. Someday she'll be a grandmother. If you hurt her, she will carry that with her every day.

I know. For a while, I lost my self-confidence. For a while, I lived in fear. For a while, I lost faith in myself.

I got back my self-confidence. I overcame the fear. I certainly believe in myself. But a little tiny part of me still hurts, every day, and I will never forget that night.

Sexual harrassment on IRC, e-mail can be easily avoided

Editor,

Once again I feel compelled to write to set a few things straight, this time about sexual harassment on the Internet and the availability of information in today's world.

It seems that there have been problems with unwanted messages, and though I do not know the specifics of the incidents, I do know it is possible to stop yourself from reading the messages.

In the case of real-life harassment, you cannot stop yourself from hearing others' comments, feeling unwanted physical contact or seeing another's rude or suggestive behaviors.

However, with electronic communication, you are always given a warning in the form of a name (real or not) that shows you who is sending the message.

Now, here's the trick. If someone is sending you a message you'd rather not read, don't read the messages with that person's name on them. If you find it too strenuous to ignore them yourself, you can have your software do it for you.

IRC has a built-in ignore name, address function for you to use, which is much easier to type than a letter to the editor or a formal complaint.

> "The embrace of technology is not always what you think it is, or what you want."
> • JANUSZ JAWORKSI
> SENIOR IN DANCE AND SECONDARY EDUCATION

Even the bare-bones, e-mail-reading program has the capability to delete messages, without you having to read them.

If you respond to a message, the person knows you read what they send, and for some people, that is all they want. In a sense, they feed off it. So beware.

For those of you who are not too worried about the messages, but rather, the other information that people might collect about you, I have bad news for you. Anyone with a few bucks to spend can find out your name, address, telephone number, credit history and mother's maiden name.

If you go into Farrell Library, you can get names, addresses and telephone numbers for anyone in the United States for free. If you have a credit card, checking account or phone number listed by your name, you are in many databases, and the only thing stopping a person from finding out more about you is someone else that person finds more interesting.

The technology the world seems to hold as wonderful is the same technology that allows others to wrap their hands around your personal life.

The embrace of technology is not always what you think it is, or what you want, and the only way to free yourself from its grasp is to stop using it.

It can be done, if you're willing to accept a more simple life.

Self-policing best solution to cyber-harrassment problem

Editor,

The editorial "University administrators need to establish sexual harassment policy for e-mail users" was as clear as mud.

After reading it, I have no idea what course of action is being recommended.

Do you want the University to intervene with more policies and enforcement, or do you want the users to self-police?

There are significant advantages and disadvantages of each approach. But I think for the most part one thing must be made clear; unless you physically observe the person in the act of composing and sending the message, you do not know the true identity of the harasser. Forging e-mail and using another person's account are just a couple of things that can cause identity confusion.

Consider the hypothetical occasion in which you forget to log off a computer in a public lab, someone sits down and uses your account to harass someone else, and a couple of days later you are facing charges or expulsion.

Doesn't sound too pleasant does it?

The self-policing method isn't a perfect solution, but at this time, it is probably the best. For example, there are several technological incarnations that can filter out harassing e-mail, chat messages and offensive World Wide Web pages.

If you rely on the University to solve these problems, you will most likely see chat services like IRC and other academically questionable services disabled.

Cats face Cyclone's real deal

STORY BY JEREMY KELLEY PHOTOGRAPHS BY JILL JARSULIC

COACH BILL SNYDER walks down the sideline near the end of the Colorado game. Snyder watched his Wildcats fall to the sixth-ranked Buffaloes.

K-State's defense will face one of its toughest assignments of the season this weekend when it squares off against one of the nation's elite rushers.

The Iowa State Cyclones bring one of the most prolific runners in collegiate-football history to KSU Stadium Saturday — Troy Davis.

"Troy Davis is a legitimate Heisman Trophy candidate," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He's the real deal."

Davis needs just 40 yards in Saturday's game to become the first player in college-football history to record a pair of 2,000-yard rushing seasons.

"Troy Davis is an outstanding back," free safety Mario Smith said. "He can get under the defense and make some yards."

Davis, who was the nation's No. 1 rusher and all-purpose performer in 1995, is second in the nation in rushing yards per game at 196.

"Troy truly is a challenge," Snyder said. "He has a good offensive lines who gives him a lot of opportunities."

Snyder said K-State's defense wasn't going to concentrate solely on Davis, because he is going to get his yards no matter what.

"Maybe you can find a way to stop him," he said. "You can put 11 people up there, but that's suicide."

Snyder said the offensive line was one of the main weapons the Cyclone offense boasted.

"They do about as fine a job with their offensive line as anyone," he said. "They certainly protect him very well. They do the job to get that back 2000 yards."

Snyder said even though the Cyclones hadn't won many games this year, they were a very good football team.

"They are just a young football team," he said. "It's awful easy to look at their numbers and say they aren't good, but I'm cautious about that."

Snyder also said Davis, who stands at a short 5'8", is a phenomenon because he gets most of his yards after he gets hit.

"His real strength is that people just bounce off of him. He's cut so low, and his center of gravity is so low, and he breaks a lot of tackles," he said.

Not only do the Cats have to contend with the Heisman finalist, but they also have to be aware of the Cyclones' passing defense.

"Todd Doxson has done a nice job. He's completing about 56 percent of his passes, so that gives them some balance in their offense," Snyder said. "When they are balanced, they obviously have a pretty good defense."

Many questions have surrounded the offensive production of the Wildcats, who rank dead last in the conference in total offense.

"Obviously, we are playing good defense, and we are not killing ourselves with turnovers," Snyder said. "Some things are more positive than our offense."

IOWA STATE running back Troy Davis needs just 40 yards in Saturday's contest with the Cats to record his second-consecutive 2,000-yard rushing season.

Smith said he realizes Wildcat defense has to step up the defensive intensity and make plays when the offense isn't having a good day.

"We know that we have to make plays and put it together on the defensive end. We've put together enough to get where we are right now," he said.

The Cats' defense, which ranks second in the Big 12, puts points on the board when Small colleges provide some of football's brightest stars

You can probably remember many current NFL players who have come from big Division I schools. Sure, there are lots of players who have come from the USCs, Ohio State, Michigan or Penn State.

But can you name the NFL players who have come from schools like Ferrum College, Central State or Livingstone?

These schools, along with other small colleges, have provided the NFL with some of its brightest stars.

Shane McCORMICK

Three small colleges have provided the Super Bowl champion Dallas Cowboys one of the most dominating offensive lines. Considered as one of the leagues meanest linemen, tackle Erik Williams wasn't a well-known player from a big school.

No, he played his college ball at Central State in Ohio. Florida A&M produced all-Pro guard Nate Newton, while Sonoma State did the same with Larry Allen.

The myth for years has been that Division I football provides stiffer competition. The players are bigger, faster and more athletic. But the fact is that Division II or Division III contains many players who share those same qualities. It's just that these players are not fortunate enough to get the exposure Division I players receive.

The 1995 Pro Bowl was a showing of NFL players who had gained stardom, even though they had not played at a big college. New England tight end Ben Coates earned his second consecutive trip to the Pro Bowl.

Coates polished his abilities at Livingstone College, which had an enrollment of 650. Others featured in that Pro Bowl included Seattle running back Chris Warren, who played at Ferrum College in Virginia, Pittsburgh linebacker Greg Lloyd (Fort Valley State) and Denver tight end Shannon Sharpe (Savannah State).

Many players at different positions have made it to the NFL from small colleges. But it is at the wide-receiver position where many NFL teams have found their diamonds in the rough.

The most obvious example of this is San Francisco wide receiver Jerry Rice. Considered to be the best ever at his position, Rice wasn't noticed at a big Division I school. No, his skills were developed at Mississippi State, where he set 18 NCAA Division I-AA records.

Pittsburgh wide receiver Yancy Thigpen finished second in the AFC in receiving yards in 1995 with 1,307. His 85 receptions made a team record, a mark that earned Thigpen his first Pro Bowl.

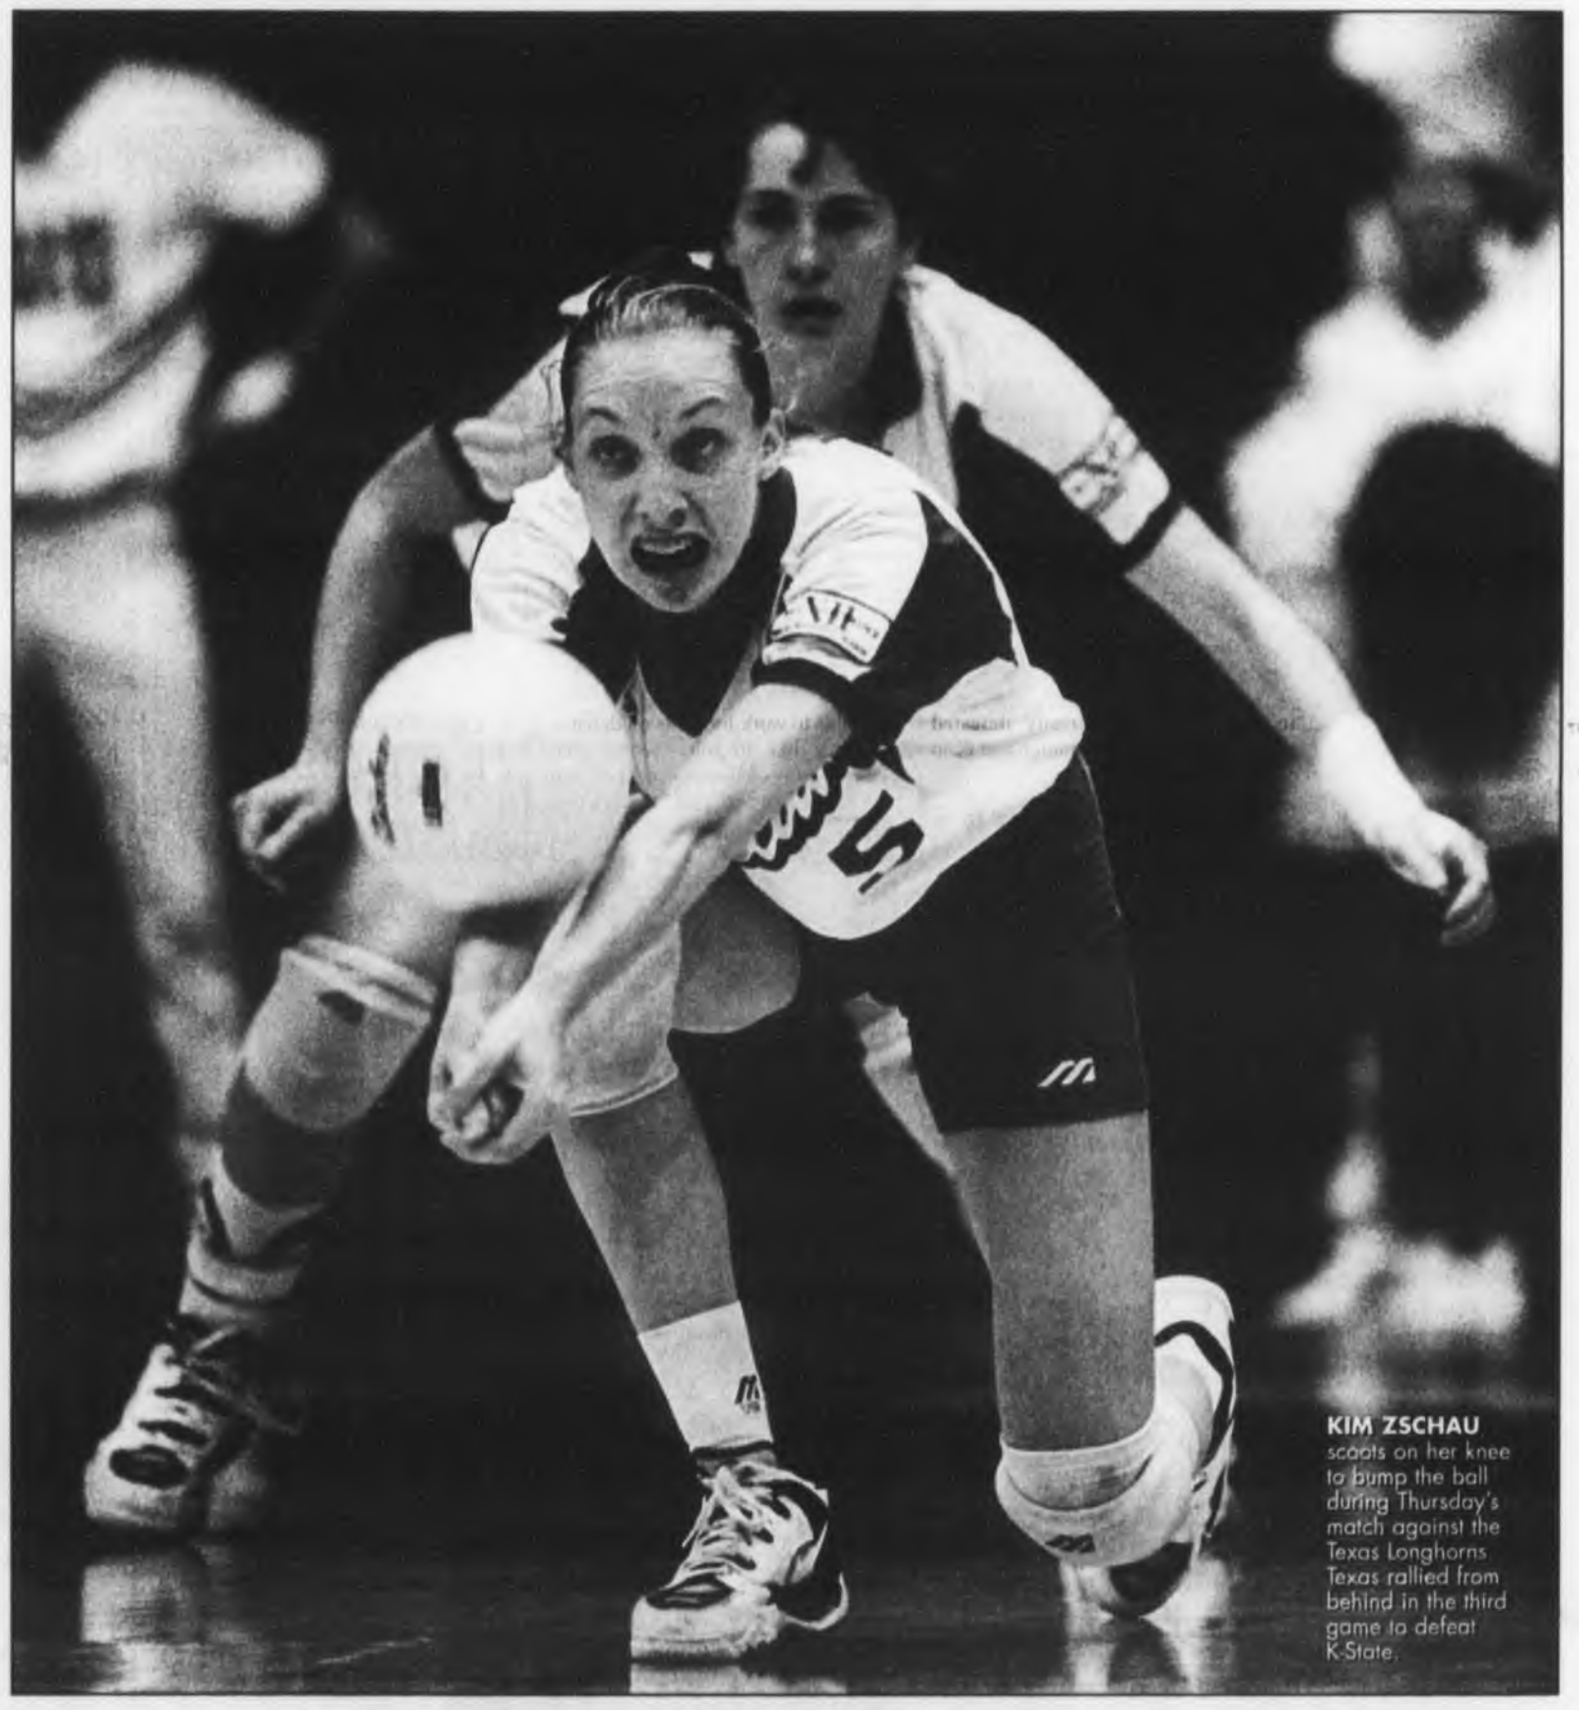
After high school, Thigpen went to Winston-Salem State, a Division II school.

Other wide receivers who have caught on in the NFL include the Packers' Don Beebe, the Jets' Wayne Chrebet and the Bills' Andre Reed.

Probably the greatest story of the three has to be Chrebet. Growing up, Chrebet had a passion for the New York Jets (probably the only kid in the world who did).

After breaking many school records at Division I-AA Hofstra, Chrebet found his way on the Jets' team through free agency. In 1995, Chrebet was only one of two Jet players to start all 16 games on offense.

So how do these small college players make it to the NFL?



Mental toughness.

Players from small colleges develop more of a mental toughness. They have to. They know they have to go out and prove themselves every game. For many, the only chance they get to show off their skills to scouts is at the senior All-Star games. They know this is their big chance. They have to show the scouts what they can do on every play.

Players from big Division I schools who have played on television can afford a slip here or there. Scouts have seen their talent and skills before, and they know what they can do. But for small-college players, many times there is no room for error. They may get written off as small-college players who couldn't make it in the NFL.

Regardless of whether a player went to Notre Dame or Ferrum College, it is their talent and determination that should be the requirements for making it to the NFL.

Wildcats drop third-straight, battle Texas A&M Saturday

The K-State volleyball team hit a season low, losing its third-straight match Thursday night against Texas 0-3.

The Wildcats got things off on the right track in the first game, scoring the first point, but the Longhorns answered back with two of their own. The Wildcats scored two more points, and then the Longhorns took charge, winning the game 15-8.

The first game seemed to carry over into the second, and Texas jumped out to a 10-0 lead. K-State coach Jim Moore tried to pump life into the team by clearing the bench. Redshirt freshman setter Linsey Luther, freshman middle blocker Mandy Whitfield and freshman middle blocker Heather Lindell all saw action in the game.

Still, the Longhorns went on to whip the Cats 15-2.

Moore said replacing the starters was a move of desperation.

"I just didn't know what to do," Moore said. "I asked them downstairs what they wanted me to do, and this was the only thing I could come up with. This is the second time this year that we just quit, and quitting is just unacceptable."

After intermission the Wildcats came out with some spark. K-State jumped out to a 10-2 lead, and things started to unravel. Texas scored four straight points to come back within four at 10-6. K-State answered back with a mini-run of its own, jumping the score back to 13-6. The Wildcats, however, could not put the game away and gave away the last eight points of the game.

Still the 10-2 lead should have been enough for the Cats to pull out a win.

"They came back, and they played pretty well — but not well enough to win," Moore said. "When you're up as much as we were up, you have to put that game away. I don't care who you're playing. That game has got to be over."

Senior setter Devon Ryning said the team lost its focus once it built up the lead.

"It seems like whenever our team gets up, we don't think about what's going on," Ryning said. "We have to figure out what to do to fix that."

Moore said Texas, ranked No. 8 in the nation, played a tough game.

"Texas played great," Moore said. "Part of it was that we really did play poorly in games one and two, but they were really good."

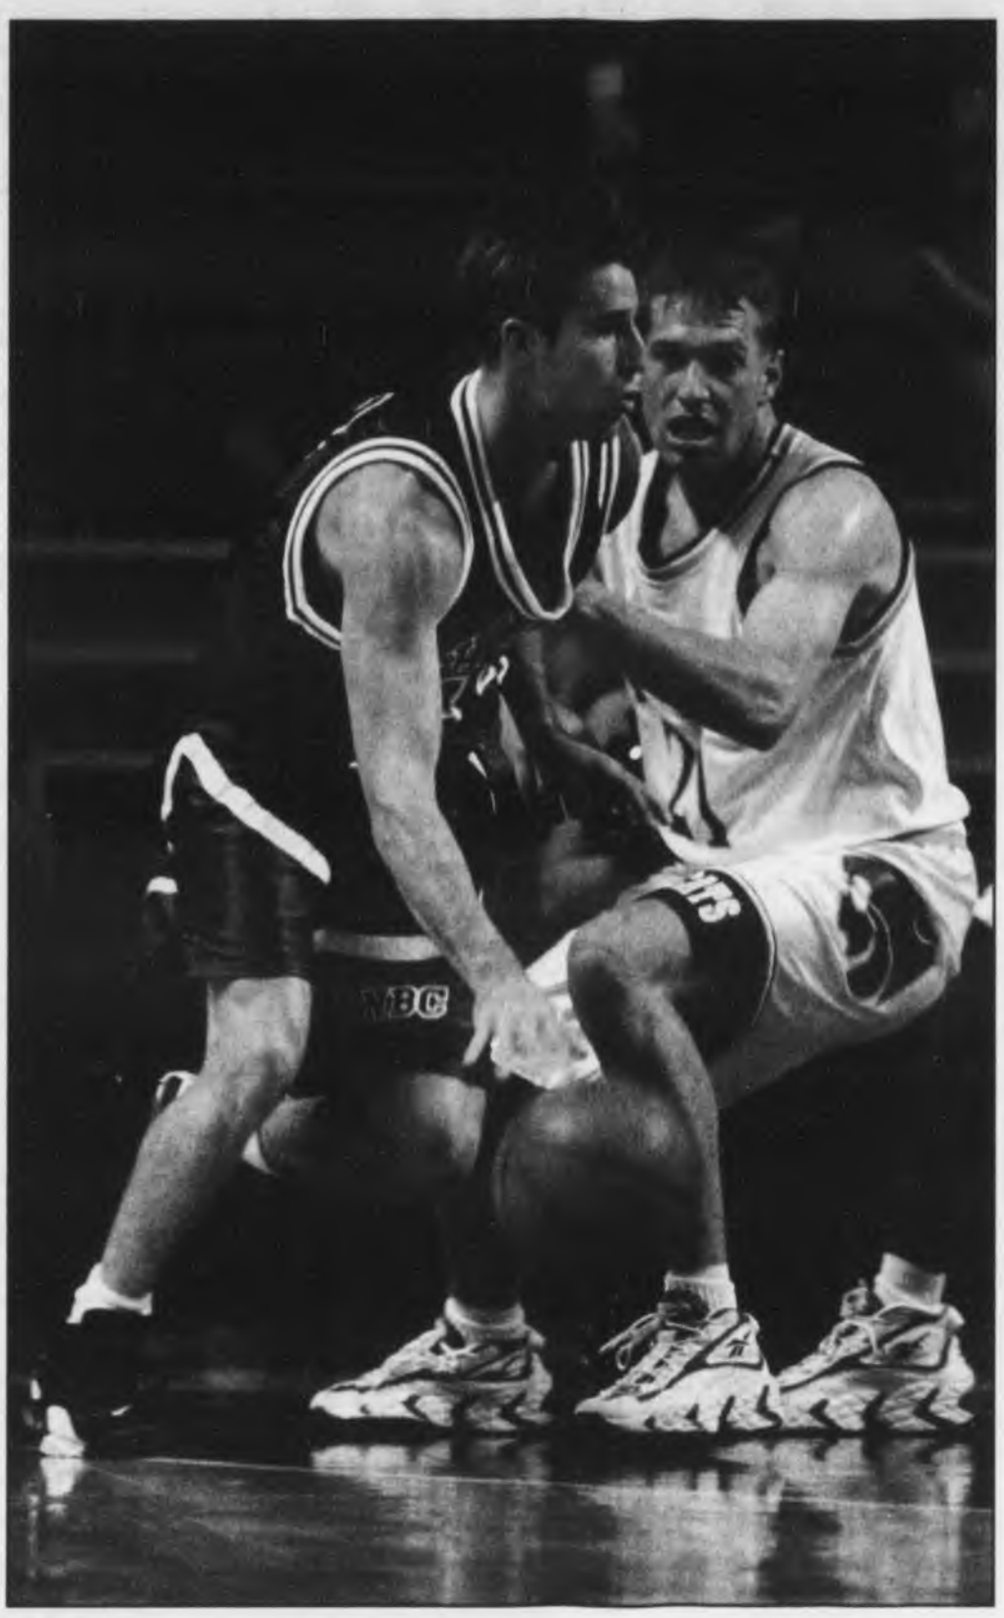
The Longhorns' key to killing the Cats came at the net. Texas outblocked K-State 15.5 to 4.

"When you get blocked like that, it's real hard to recover," Moore said. "We just panicked, and we were kind of able to regroup, but they were really, really good."

Ryning said getting outblocked by the Longhorns was her fault.

"Honestly, if you look at it, there were always two people on the block, and that all comes back on me," Ryning said. "I think I was selling some of my sets, and they knew where the ball was going. I think that all comes back on me."

Now the Wildcats must quickly turn things around before Saturday night's game at 7 against No. 14-ranked Texas A&M. K-State is in desperate need of a win to wrap up an NCAA Tournament spot.



"We have to regroup," Moore said. "I don't know what the percentages would be for getting in the tournament if we don't win Saturday night's game. I don't want to take the chance of finding out."

Ryning said there is no added pressure on the Saturday game.

"We have had must-wins from the beginning of the year," Ryning said. "We know what we have to do, and that's what we've been concentrating on throughout the season."

The biggest concern for the Cats is the question of whether the team will be able to regain its confidence. Coming out and winning the first game against Texas A&M might not be enough.

"We have to come out and just win game one, game two and game three," Ryning said. "That would help out our confidence. I think we just have to come out, and for once we just have to play. It's time to play."

Match-up against UMKC comes on the heels of 1-1 preseason; starting lineup still in the air

sports writer

At 8 tonight the men's basketball team will really get things started. The Wildcats, who went 1-1 in preseason play, will open regular season with the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

In some ways, tonight's match-up is no different from preseason. At least in preparation respects.

"We're more worried about ourselves and how we play than we are worried about them," Coach Tom Asbury said.

The Cats are coming off a preseason loss to the Australian Adelaide 36ers Friday night. Asbury said the loss made his team think about some things.

"I think we'll be ready for our first game tonight," Asbury said. "The loss got our senses sharpened, and it showed us we got a lot of work to do and lots of things to improve on. "

One thing still up in the air for the Cats is the starting line-up.

"The situation has gotten muddied a little bit, and as of right now there is only one sure starter, and that's Gerald Eaker," Asbury said. "This is probably going to be the type of team where we have several starting line-ups throughout the course of the year. It's not going to mean anything by who starts."

> "Who's the group on the court at the end of the game is going to be the key ingredient."
> • TOM ASBURY
> MEN'S BASKETBALL COACH

Another person who hasn't found a starting spot as of yet is sophomore Shawn Rhodes.

"Shawn might be our most versatile player," Asbury said. "He might not start any games for us this year, or he might start all of our games.

"I tell the guys that it doesn't matter who starts. Starting is not near as important as finishing. Who's the group on the court at the end of the game is going to be the key ingredient."

Asbury said his team doesn't know exactly what UMKC might throw at them tonight.

"We can't scout them, and we don't have any tapes on them," Asbury said. "They didn't play any exhibition, but they look like they're a running transition team with a pressure defense."

Women gear up for home opener

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

It's not just practice anymore.

Friday night the K-State women's basketball team takes the floor for its home opener against Memphis.

The going won't be easy for the Wildcats. Last year, Memphis handed K-State its first loss of the season, a 72-57 pounding at Memphis' tournament, the Lady Tiger Classic.

All but one player returned from that Memphis team, which advanced to the NCAA Tournament last year.

"We'll be facing a program that's been in the NCAA Tournament for the last several years, so they know what it takes to be able to compete at the next level," K-State coach Deb Patterson said.

Leading the Lady Tiger attack will be all-America candidate LaTonya Johnson. A 6'1" forward, Johnson scored 22 points in Memphis' exhibition victory over Athletes in Action, a touring team that has already defeated national powers Old Dominion and Penn State.

Guard Kitty Allen scored 13 points in that game, and forward Tamicka Whitmore added 11.

But it's not the Memphis offense that has the team concerned — it's how it gets into the Cat offense.

"Their press is very effective, and they use their full-court defense to get into their offense," Patterson said.

> "We'll have to contain their guards and keep the ball out of the post because of their size."
> • MISSY DECKER
> SENIOR GUARD

That press is of special concern to a team operating without a true point guard and gave up 23 turnovers in its exhibition opener.

To slow down the Lady Tigers, K-State must not only protect the ball against the press, but it must also force Memphis to work for shots on defense.

"They like to run," senior guard Missy Decker said. "They don't like to play offense for 30 seconds continuously.

"We'll have to contain their guards and keep the ball out of the post because of their size. But we have to make them work for their shots."

All five K-State starters scored nine points or more in the Cats' only exhibition game to date, Sunday's defeat at the hands of Uralmash, a Russian club team.

"We have to have that kind of balance from our starters," Patterson said.

Tip-off is set for 5 p.m. Friday at Bramlage Coliseum, followed by Homecoming activities and the men's home opener against UMKC.

JACK GLADSTONE, Native American singer from the Montana Blackfeet, sings about the culture of his tribe during a lecture Thursday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Speaker explains Native American history, stories to students

ALLISON WOODALL
staff reporter

Howling could be heard from the K-State Student Union Ballroom last night, but there were no ghosts and ghouls.

Jack Gladstone, Native American singer and lecturer, had students signing, laughing and yelping as they learned about Native American history.

Gladstone is in his eighth season delivering campus presentations. This is his second visit to K-State.

He said he wanted to make all students reflect on this continent's history.

"This is for everyone," he said. "We are all a part of our American heritage, whether you are purple, black, red or white."

Gladstone said he did not come to K-State to cause mass change or consciousness-raising, but to reach the individual.

He said he believes change occurs slowly as people change their behaviors on a personal level.

"There has been a real paradigm shift," he said. "But it didn't happen overnight. It has taken a long time, because people change at different levels and rates."

Gladstone cited the American public's support of the Clean Air and Water Act as evidence of the shift. He also said recycling has become more common and part of the norm, rather than the exception.

His respect for the earth was relayed to students.

"It was really deep the way he talked about calling earth she, rather than it," Philip Betts, junior in interior architecture, said. "He really had me thinking."

The singing during the lecture kept students awake and involved.

"I think one of his real strengths is how he encourages crowd participation," Colette McLemore, junior in architectural engineering, said. "He had us howling and singing right along with him."

Gladstone delivered the message, but he left the rest up to the audience.

"We all have the capability," he said. "Whether we'll have the political will varies with the individual. The call of the conscience is the most important thing."

Rock opera based on album

ERICA DUNCAN
staff reporter

The Who's rock opera, "Tommy," will go on stage at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

"Tommy" was written and composed by Pete Townsend with additional music and lyrics by John Entwistle and Keith Moon, members of the rock group The Who.

This Broadway rock musical is based on a concept album about a boy who fell into a deaf, dumb and blind state after witnessing a murder.

"Tommy" will be at McCain for one night.

"The market is not large enough to have multiple dates," David Frain, assistant director of McCain, said.

Big League Theatricals of New York is the touring group that will perform. "Tommy" is a musical with 22 scenes and two acts.

Frain said he expects a crowd of about 1,500 to attend.

Preparation will be extensive. The production will bring in two trailers of equipment and will set up from 8 a.m. until just around showtime, Frain said.

Students can get seats on the main level for $17, in the lower balcony for $15 and in the upper balcony for $13. The public can get tickets for $34, $30 or $26, while senior citizens can get their tickets for $32, $28 or $24.

Operetta audition draws talent

ERICA DUNCAN
staff reporter

Nearly 50 students auditioned for the comedic operetta "Die Fledermaus" Tuesday and Wednesday night at All Faiths Chapel.

"K-State has an excellent music program," Charlotte MacFarland, the operetta's artistic director, said. "Lots of really talented people auditioned."

After students audition, the directors must match them with the appropriate part. Vocal rehearsals will start at the beginning of the spring semester, with stage rehearsals beginning two to three weeks later.

"I am impressed with the talent," Jerry Langenkamp, musical director, said.

Students had mixed feelings about their auditions.

"I felt pretty good about it. I think I did as well as the next person," Dan Scoglio, freshman in theater, said.

"I enjoy singing and figured it was right up my alley," Sandy Freed, senior in theater, said.

Freed also said she felt nervous.

"I don't think I hit the pitch I wanted to hit," she said.

Students who are cast should expect to put a lot of time and effort into the production.

The assistant stage manager, Amy Thompson, said she expects to dedicate at least 20 hours per week to the operetta. This is Thompson's second production as assistant stage manager.

A middle-aged couple's marriage is on the rocks because of the husband's tendency to chase pretty women. The husband goes to a costume ball expecting to find many beautiful women, and he falls in love with one.

The woman he falls in love with is in disguise. He finds out later that she is his wife. He then promises never to cheat on her again.

The production is technically an operetta, because it contains spoken dialogue. It is typically sung by opera companies because the music is so technically difficult, Landenkamp said.

Professor seeks link to Native American music

STORY BY MIRANDA KENNEDY

David Royse, associate professor of music education, is looking for the missing link.

"I know it's out there," he said.

He is looking for the link between the stereotype of Native American music and what traditional Native American music really sounds like. He has been researching the roots of the mass-culture stereotype of Native American music for about two years.

Part of this stereotype is the song used at football games. It is used mostly by marching bands such as the one at Florida State University, because its mascot is a Seminole Native American.

"There are a couple of ways of looking at it, because the cliché has two parts," Royse said.

The first part of the stereotypical sound is the rhythm and the fifth interval, he said. A fifth interval means notes that would be five steps apart on a piano keyboard are played together.

"The Indian sound that we know in mass culture uses that pulse of one every four," Royse said.

He said Native American drumming does not predominantly use that rhythm, but he cautions that there are always exceptions.

"Never say never or always," he said.

The second part of the stereotypical sound is the melody, like the one Florida State University uses. He said the stereotypical part is the use of harmony.

"Usually the singing's going to be all together on one line," he said. "In the traditional sense the melody does not fall within the western-tonal system. It doesn't line up exactly with the notes on a piano keyboard."

Royse said his research grew out of how he teaches the Native American music section in his class, Introduction to American Music.

"One meaningful way was to approach the Native American culture from a stereotyped notion, which is the westernized notion," he said.

He said he always started from that point, because those are the sounds that come into Americans' heads when they think of Native American music. After starting there, he could teach what traditional Native American music really sounds like.

Teaching this way made Royse curious about how this stereotypical sound started.

"So I started digging around," he said.

If you pick any 1950s western, the cliché sound is there, Royse said.

"I found certainly it was there, but it went back much earlier than that," he said.

The oldest piece of music Royse has found that sounds like the mass-culture cliché is a collection of songs from around the world that march king John Philip Sousa arranged in 1890. The secretary of the Navy asked Sousa, who was the leader of the U.S. Marine band at the time, to put the collection together.

Sousa included Native American songs to represent the United States.

Royse found this piece a little more than a year ago, but he said he thinks the cliché sound goes back even further than 1890. He said he thinks it began when researchers in the 19th century wanted to preserve Native American culture, including its music. In order to preserve it, they had to write it down.

"When you're taking a culture that is not western, write it down in western notation, it then becomes westernized through researchers writing down these songs," he said.

Royse said he does not think Sousa's collection is the beginning of the stereotypical sound. He said he thinks he might find the missing link in theater.

"Sousa was coming out of the band tradition," Royse said. "He also had a theater background."

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art's first-month anniversary was celebrated last week.

From the museum's opening on Oct. 13 through Sunday, 5,861 people have passed through its doors.

"We've been open four weeks now, and our visitor participation has been just excellent," Nelson Britt, director of the museum, said.

"If anything, we've had nothing but praise and compliments about how people have come in here and enjoyed themselves," he said.

Britt said it is too early to tell if the cafe and gift shop are successful.

"The cafe is like all restaurants in Manhattan. It has its good days and bad days," he said. "Friday seems to be a very big day."

The past month's attendance has even astonished other museum staffs.

Kathrine Walker, education coordinator of the Beach art museum, said, "Our attendance has been fantastic. When we've told other university art museum staffs our numbers, they've been impressed."

Walker said the visitors have been pretty evenly split between community members and students.

"The response has been overwhelmingly positive for the building and the collection," Walker said.

"On Family Weekend, 169 people toured and were very impressed with the building and enjoyed the collection.

"That's important because a lot of them were alumni."

In the first month, Walker said she and curator Bill North have been host to many University classes and area school groups in formal and informal programs in the art museum.

Among them was Lynda Andrus' class about art for elementary students.

Andrus, assistant professor of art, arranged for her class to participate in the Museums Unifying with Schools and Education program at the art museum.

As part of the program, Andrus said her students broke into groups and had to identify and discuss various aspects of a work of art.

"Hopefully, by doing that they began to understand the art much more than if they just visited the museum by themselves and had someone explain the art to them," Andrus said.

"The students got to experience the work."

Andrus said the majority of her students hadn't visited a museum and if they had, they complained of a bad experience.

"This museum is very friendly and encourages people to talk about the work and interact," Andrus said. "Some of them have gone back since and taken friends."

"I think it's positive," she said. "These students will be going out and teaching, and they are a real important audience.

"Now, they feel very comfortable going to a museum."

Andrus said the program was such a successful experience that she has made plans for its continuation next semester.

"We want people who are teachers to know this exists, and they can use it in their classrooms," she said.

Exhibiting artist gives lecture on printmaking at Beach art museum

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Like the seasons and Kansas' patented unpredictable weather, printmaker Tom Edwards' work changes with time.

It's not literally kinetic art, but the state of Edwards' prints vary radically between editions.

Edwards, a K-State alumnus, discussed his work in the exhibit "Tom Edwards and the Meditative State" at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art Thursday at the museum. Edwards was the 1996 Friends of Art gift print artist.

The discussion focused mainly on Edwards' unusual process of reworking his prints over the course of decades.

"Printmaking is a process that can go on forever," Edwards said. "Some of this is 20 years old."

Twenty years ago, Edwards was living in Keats, northwest of Manhattan, and finishing work on his academic career at K-State. While a student here, he received a bachelor's degree in architecture and a master's of fine arts in printmaking. Aspects of Edwards' life in and around Manhattan are very apparent in his work, which lushly depicts a Kansas landscape not of a flat emptiness, but of sumptuous detail.

In a work like "Prairie," the vastness of the Kansas landscape is evocatively represented. Edwards said he wanted to capture this feeling of vastness, the abstracted texture of the ground, and the abstract feeling of movement.

"All of these plates I do, I never consider them finished," Edwards said. "I consider them on-going works of art.

"I often start from a real location, and I change the lighting, atmosphere, the weather."

It's akin to a game to compare different editions of Edwards' work, such as in "Alleyscape," a view of the alley behind the Wareham Opera House.

"As you look at these prints, I want to make you aware of the process I go through when thinking about these pieces," he said. "I often start viewing these forms, whether buildings, shrubs or elements in the landscape, and let them act out in a narrative some event that is going on."

Edwards said he rarely prints more than two or three prints of any one work because of time limitations. The work that might be considered the highlight of the exhibit is a complex drawing, "Medieval Rock Formations-/France," ink and bleach on paper, 1996, of Chartres Cathedral.

Edwards said it not only represents an architectural drawing, but it represents a type of construction that begins at the ground up and ends with something completely different.

"It's a metaphor for my work. Nothing is ever completed, in a lot of ways," Edwards said. "Plans always change. They are always unpredictable."

The drawing owes much to Edwards' background as an architect, because he still practices in Connecticut. This is especially apparent in the perspective of the cathedral.

"There's some warped perspective," he said. "If I would have tried to draw it in real perspective, it wouldn't have fit."

Edwards said he has drawn inspiration from Renaissance-era artists, particularly the prints of Rembrandt.

"He was not willing to accept as finished what was etched into the plate," he said.

Although Edwards does rework the same prints continuously, he said he has found time to begin new prints. The lecture was part of the Department of Art's visiting-artist lecture series funded in part by the student fine arts fee.

BACK PORCH MARY band members perform during the Habitat for Humanity concert Thursday night at the Wareham Opera House. Truck Stop Love, Frogpond and Sufferbus also performed.

ROCKING FOR HOUSING
Four bands provide music in order to raise funds

R.J. Diepenbrock
staff reporter

Combine Habitat for Humanity with four bands that have signed or will sign with a major recording label and mix in beer and college students for a helluva party.

Thursday night, the Wareham Opera House lowered its lights and welcomed more than 350 people through its doors to listen to local bands, Back Porch Mary, Sufferbus, Truck Stop Love and Frogpond, an all-female group from Missouri.

The alternative rock of Back Porch Mary warmed up the crowd, and then the crowd warmed up to Frogpond. Sufferbus and Truck Stop Love followed.

This was Truck Stop Love's final Manhattan performance. The band is disbanding, though each of the members are not done entertaining.

"Pretty special night for us," said Rich Yarges, guitarist for Truck Stop Love and K-State graduate.

"Never quit playing music," he said.

Eric Melin, drummer for Truck Stop Love and K-State graduate, said he loved playing at the Wareham.

"Glad to be here," Melin said. "Glad to play for Habitat for Humanity."

Melin said he had mixed feelings about the night.

"I don't know. I've played for this band six years," Melin said.

Jim Crego, guitarist for Truck Stop Love and Sufferbus, said he liked playing at the Wareham because it was big.

"Big is better," Crego said. "Love it. Sweet venue."

The audience members also loved the bands. They began clapping and cheering the songs.

This was all done in support of Habitat.

"I've been there before," said Chris Henrie, bass player for Back Porch Mary. "I like playing these sorta things."

Mike Krug, guitarist for Back Porch Mary and senior in history, said he was happy they were asked to perform.

"We're just happy we were asked to play here," Krug said.

Stephanie Wesemann, senior in architectural engineering and publicity co-chair for Habitat, said the concert was to raise money to build houses for low-income families.

But with each home costing about $35,000, the funds are not easily available.

Beth Kosiba, sophomore in psychology and vice president of Habitat, said the concert was one of the best ways to raise money and involve the community.

"After last year's concert, we needed something bigger," Kosiba said. "This year, the radio has helped."

KMKF-FM 101.5 helped advertise the concert by promoting the event over the radio several times a day, said Eric Launy, a disc jockey known on K-Rock as Eric D.

"We're here to make a lot of money and hear music," Launy said. "All the proceeds go to Habitat for Humanity."

Another business that came in support of Habitat was Greek's Pizzeria. Selling cheese and pepperoni pizza by the slice for $2, any money made would be donated to Habitat for Humanity, pizzeria owner and K-State graduate Adam Gaimes said.

"This meets two goals," Gaimes said. "This helps Habitat for Humanity and helps get our name out to the community."

Danita Dickinson-Ahrens, Manhattan, said she came to hear some music.

"There are a lot of people here," Dickinson-Ahrens said. "I like the pretty lights."

disability paperwork. He also uses client services.

"I can use MAP to go to my doctors' appointments," he said.

"They can get you in to counseling and be there for you when you need help."

MAP also offers a support group for families, run by two mothers who lost sons to AIDS. Trulson said the group meets twice a month with those infected with HIV or full-blown AIDS, partners and families.

"Whoever can benefit from it," she said.

• MAP FUNDRAISING

Amy Spear, junior in social work, is a volunteer for MAP. Spear said that after doing a research project on HIV and AIDS, she decided to become more involved with MAP.

"I wanted to work with HIV/AIDS. I wanted to be involved in the prevention and awareness, so I gave them a call," she said.

Spear is now working with a fundraising committee for MAP. Past fundraising efforts include a raffle, a chili supper and a garage sale. Gears will shift for MAP fundraising at the beginning of the year.

"We realize we need to do a lot of fundraising and grant writing," Trulson said. The Kansas Department of Health and Environment recently awarded MAP a grant of $15,477. The grant was used to develop project REALITY, which targets the African American community with education about HIV and AIDS.

REALITY is primarily active in Riley and Geary counties, but it also reaches surrounding counties. To volunteer or find out more about REALITY, call 587-1999.

The MAP Awareness Committee is planning its first large-scale fundraiser.

"We've never gone this massive with anything. It's kind of exciting," Trulson said.

Three performances of "Anyone Can Whistle," a musical including works of Andrew Lloyd Weber, will promote awareness of MAP and HIV, Trulson said.

Performance nights are Nov. 23 at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego, Nov. 29 at the Little Theater in Junction City and Nov. 30 at the Manhattan Arts Center. To reserve tickets, leave a message on MAP's voice mail at 532-1500.

• MAP SPEAKS

Trulson said MAP speaks to many clubs and organizations and has visited classes at K-State. Lectures are factual, such as AIDS 101, or personal accounts of struggles with HIV/AIDS. Trulson said these talks can either involve someone with HIV or full-blown AIDS or a family member who has gone through the fight against AIDS.

Ray, who found out he was HIV-positive five years ago while he was a student at K-State, goes out with MAP to speak to groups about AIDS.

"Going out and speaking with MAP makes me feel better about myself," he said.

"If I can prevent one person from getting this disease, I've done something right," Ray said. "If I can teach them to do things right, they won't come down with this. I don't want them to go through the pain and agony that people with HIV and AIDS are going through now."

Ray said he has spoken to college students, church groups, nurses and doctors. The lecturers also travel to speak to surrounding-area schools and groups.

"All of us enjoy going out, because it's a word to get the education out about the disease," Trulson said. "It's also a way to get the Manhattan AIDS Project name out, so if anybody is HIV and they don't know we're here, they can maybe be made aware of it."

MAP education focuses on the realization that AIDS can affect anyone. Trulson said AIDS is the leading killer of males and females between age 25 and 40.

"I am a firm believer that there should be no reason anybody should get AIDS, because the education is out there," she said. "If you care about yourself, there should be no reason you contract this virus."

Trulson said infection of young people with HIV is rising.

"Young people tend to feel it cannot happen to them unless they are an IV drug user or gay," she said. "It can happen to anybody."

AIDS quilt parts to be dispalyed at K-State

Darcie McConkey
staff reporter

Many Americans share a common thread: They face the deadly and incurable disease of AIDS.

That thread has sewn the Names Project AIDS Memorial Quilt together and allows family, friends and partners to celebrate the memories of their loved ones who have died from the disease.

The national AIDS quilt consists of 37,472 panels, which represent 12 percent of AIDS-related deaths in the United States and other international countries. K-State will only be welcoming several quilt panels to display Dec. 2-6 in the K-State Student Union small art gallery.

Along with the display, the opening and closing ceremonies will incorporate a remembrance of victims, presentations of new panels and a candle-lighting ceremony.

The theme for this year's display is "One World, One Hope." Because AIDS knows no borders, it affects everyone around the world. This event urges the world to focus on the deadly disease and help bring an end to the epidemic.

CLOSING CEREMONY

K-State's Communic-able Disease Committee, which is responsible for the AIDS educational programs that are available on campus, is planning this event. Don Fallon, committee chairman and K-State coordinator of religious activities, said he believes there are several reasons why the week is important.

"The main reason we want to display the quilt is to remember those people who have suffered. It also says this worldwide disease is now touching all of our families in some way," Fallon said.

Another reason, he said, was to provide support and meaning to the families, friends and partners of AIDS victims.

"It is important that we create awareness of this disease. It personally affects all our lives. This quilt presents a deep educational value in our communities, like the meaning of relationships, sexual activities and the quality of life we are creating for future children and families. The quilt is a very strong educational tool," he said.

The quilt display and ceremonies are open to the public. The committee encourages everyone to become involved and invite people to participate in reading the AIDS victims' names during the opening ceremony and during the lunch hour.

"We want people to share in the experience," Fallon said.

SPEECH

Fitzwater said, not to follow trends.

"In 1973, there were 457 Elvis impersonators," he said. "In 1996, there are 2,376 Elvis impersonators. If this trend continues, by the year 2000 one in four Americans will be an Elvis impersonator.

"I think we have to ask the question, if not the three people next to you — then who?"

Republicans were not spared from Fitzwater's lecture, however.

"The big event with the Republicans this year was Jack Kemp's selection as Bob Dole's running mate," he said. "Jack has the distinction of being the first person ever chosen to take everyone's mind off of Newt Gingrich."

But Fitzwater also talked about the serious side of politics.

"The presidency is a very personal issue for me," he said. "One never knows what a presidency will be remembered for.

"Harry Truman went in scared and came out a man of steel. LBJ went in a strong congressman and came out defeated. Ronald Reagan went in an actor and came out ending the Cold War."

The nation's response to the president led Fitzwater to his next topic — the media.

"The earlier developments in communications changed the way the message was sent to America," Fitzwater said. "But it really didn't affect the messenger."

However, he said the introduction of the computer and the satellite had such an effect.

"They changed the character and the nature of the game," he said. "They revolutionized the media, and blurred the profile of journalists.

"With the computer, everyone is a journalist," he said. "Anyone can get on their computer and print out their own newsletter."

Similarly, Fitzwater said the satellite introduced a new market for information.

"With the satellite, you are everywhere all the time," he said. "It's all live, and there is little time for reflection. They are looking for anyone who can fill the time."

Another problem of the information age was money, he said.

"Nowadays, anchors are making $7-$10 million," he said. "How can they be a representative of the national audience?"

Fitzwater said the solutions for such problems included voluntary accountability and disclosure by the media.

"The news media needs to tell us who is giving us information," he said. "We need to know if they are responsible or if they have a bias."

Fitzwater closed his lecture saying he felt newspapers of today were better than ever before.

"People now turn to the computer for news and information," he said. "But they return to the newspaper for depth and perception."

After the lecture, Fitzwater answered questions from the media, including a question about the current condition of Reagan, who was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease two years ago.

"At this point, he doesn't have much memory," Fitzwater said. "He can't remember things within the past year. But his physical condition is great."

Another topic was Clinton's second term.

"I think his second term will be more productive than people think," Fitzwater said. "If he becomes too liberal, then Congress won't work with him. Similarly, Congress wants to work with him to make some accomplishments for themselves."

As for the future, Fitzwater said he would like to write another book in addition to his best selling "Call the Briefing!" which accounts for his 10 years in the White House.

"I want to write a novel about a small town in Kansas — something made up," he said. "Although a lot of people will say I made up my last book."

and faculty at the journalism school, from which he graduated in 1964.

Fitzwater answered questions for the group about his life, his work, national politics and the future of journalism.

He also gave the students advice for their own futures, telling them they were on the right track just by being in school.

"Where you go to college is a crucial decision," Fitzwater said. "You'll look back in a few years and say, 'Wow. I don't know how I ended up at K-State, but that really made a difference.' Your first job will also be a crucial decision. Where you start out can help determine your course."

"It's very difficult to come up with very obvious statistics," he said.

Galitzer said he thinks the manual refers to working with carcinogens in the context of doing research with them, not coming in contact with them while studying a cadaver.

"I don't view people that are working with cadavers that are preserved specimens as working with the carcinogens," he said.

Because of his concern, Perchellet wrote a letter Nov. 18 to the Kansas Department of Human Resources, Industrial Safety and Health to file a formal complaint about the chemical fumes.

In addition to the original letter, dated Sept. 6, in which Perchellet outlined his concerns about the lab, Perchellet mailed a second letter to Galitzer. He also sent this second letter to President Wefald and numerous employees in the biology division.

Though Wefald wasn't available for comment, Chuck Reagan, executive assistant to the president, said the University is taking Perchellet's complaint seriously.

"Anytime someone raises an issue like this, we take it seriously," he said.

He said Perchellet's letter has not been ignored.

"We're working on it and have been working on it," he said.

In a Nov. 20 letter to Perchellet, President Wefald and numerous Division of Biology employees, Galitzer outlined his suggestions to improve the ventilation of the rooms in Ackert. His ideas included keeping the doors to the classrooms shut to improve the number of air exchanges per hour.

Galitzer said he is planning on retesting the cadaver room to find out formaldehyde levels again when new cadavers arrive for the spring semester.

offense is lacking. K-State allows on average 295 yards per game, just 60 yards behind Nebraska's average.

"We've always played hard, and we always will. Our defense is relatively stable in that effect," Snyder said.

With a win, K-State would seem to be the provincial favorite for the Cotton Bowl, but Snyder said it wasn't a concern of his right now.

"I have told our players what I know, and I don't think anything is a given, but my perception is that it has to be a 9-2 team," he said.

Watch Monday's Collegian to discover how K-State fared on the gridiron, on the volleyball court and on the roundball court.

Need a gift? Have no money?

Really, it is possible to find presents for loved ones at low expense

Matt Spurgin
staff reporter

Filling that holiday gift list can be difficult to do on the budget of a college student, but there are gifts out there for $10 and less. Many area businesses have a variety of these gifts, aside from that thought-lacking gift certificate.

For the music fan, Hastings Entertainment, Musicland and Streetside Records have an assortment of compact-disc and cassette-storage cases for less than $10. They also have some CDs and cassettes in this price range.

All the CD and cassette singles are also less than $10. Hastings and Streetside have used CDs for less than $10 and Hastings and Musicland have an assortment of movies for $9.99 and less.

Varney's Book Store has a variety of items for holiday gifts.

"Quite a few of our general reading books are under $10," Steve Levin, assistant manager at Varney's, said.

He said the calenders and gift books are popular items at holiday times.

Levin also said Varney's has a large selection of K-State souvenirs including ID wallets, mugs, stickers and clothing.

Varney's also carries supplies that students in art and architecture classes need.

"We have a whole array of products under $10, but our staff is very helpful and knowledgeable, so they can help you find what you need for your friend," Levin said.

Gary Bedenharn, owner of On The Wild Side, said he has incense gifts and kits in this price range.

The store also has children's toys, chimes and beads to make necklaces, but Bedenharn said candles seem to be a popular item with the college-age shoppers at these prices.

Bryan Taylor, owner of the Palace Cards and Gifts, said Winnie-the-Pooh items are popular this year, but the Palace also has gift books, candles, gift soaps and stationery.

Christian Books and Gifts also has many gift items.

"We've got a few Bibles. Most of them are over that, but we have a few under $10," Rex Miller, manager of Christian Books and Gifts, said.

The store also has many paperback books and a few hardback books for all ages. Cassettes, CDs and other items such as pens, costume jewelry, videos and novelty pens and pencils for children are also available.

"We sell an awful lot of gift books," Miller said.

He said calendars, music and the gift books are popular gifts, especially books from the "God's Little Instruction Book" series.

Westloop Floral has many gift items such as table decorations, vases with greenery and plants with holiday decorations. It will also have candy bars, hot-chocolate canisters and other items made up into gift baskets.

These will feature Ghirardelli chocolates, which Karen Medlin, manager of Westloop Floral, said are superior quality chocolates from San Francisco.

She said the most popular items are usually the vases and pre-decorated items that are quick and easy to take to someone without needing to be wrapped.

Rod's Hallmark Shop also has an assortment of ornaments, candles, puzzles and games.

Many other area businesses have gift items for less than $10. Just remember, it's the thought that counts.

Not enough cash? Not enough skills?
Not enough time? Not enough imagination?
Who says you can't buy love?

Mary Renee SMITH

I am not man-bashing. I like men. I feel obligated to say this before I begin to portray the male of our species as thoughtless, clueless insensitive creatures with little or no foresight and very little money.

The fact is most men just aren't good at gift buying. Most men will readily admit this.

Ever gone to Kmart on Christmas Eve? There are men in droves looking for that perfect gift and usually failing miserably.

To make matters worse, most of us are trapped in a repressed financial situation (dirt poor); therefore, gifts must be affordable (cheap).

What most men don't realize is the cost of the gift is not necessarily important. Well, I lie ...

What most men don't realize is the cost of the gift is not necessarily important. Well, I lie. If you have been dating for a significant amount of time, there had better be something shiny under the tree besides the tinsel hairball left by the cat.

But in most cases, it is indeed the thought that counts.

There are plenty of inexpensive gifts that will show the one you love you care.

In my newly self-appointed post as the K-State pleasure activist, I will try to make your relationships better by suggesting a few gift ideas.

Even if you are not a poet, write a love poem. No matter how bad the poem, the time and thought taken to write the poem will make it a great gift.

A rock. No, not a diamond, a small rock. The kind they sell at nature stores. This is a cheap (usually less than a dollar) gift. Your significant other can carry it in her pocket or elsewhere to think of you.

Personalized ornaments. The shiny gold kind you had as a child. (And I'll bet still they still hang on your parents' tree.)

A letter from Santa.

A roll of quarters. What college student couldn't use a roll of quarters for parking meters or the laundromat?

For the romantic among you, try a box of Mr. Bubble Bubble Bath and a few candles.

Drive her to and from all classes for a week. A mighty thoughtful gift as Kansas winter kicks in.

Can't afford a ring? Those cute rings from bubble-gum machines are a sweet touch.

Give up a bad habit.

Give her the shirt she always borrows from you.

A get-out-of-town-for-a-day-free card. Topeka, Kansas City, Wamego ... anywhere for those days she just has to get out of Manhattan.

Call her parents, find out what her favorite book was as a child and buy it.

A box of crayons, the big box with the sharpener in the back and a coloring book. Coloring is a great stress reliever.

Half a gallon of Ben and Jerry's ice cream and a sterling silver spoon. These spoons really aren't that expensive (about $5). You can find them at any department store in the baby department.

One of those ID bracelets you used to give in junior high.

A keychain with Mace. Campus just isn't as safe as it used to be.

Get baby pictures of the two of you, and put them in a side-by-side frame.

Going to be apart for the holidays? Buy a prepaid calling card so you can keep in touch.

A keepsake box for mementos like ticket stubs and love notes.

A big box or bag of her favorite candy.

A box of Christmas cards (send them out ... shudder ... together).

A coupon book of IOUs (dinner, massage or sexual favors).

Write some love spells and include candles.

The ultra-cool refillable mug from Espresso Royale Cafe. You get 25 cents off your drink every time you bring it back. The gift that keeps on giving.

Buy matching Santa hats.

C-H-O-C-O-L-A-T-E.

Warm socks. This will also prevent those nasty cold feet in bed.

A loofah and some blueberry syrup. (Don't ask, inside joke.)

Buy a Penthouse Forum and read it to her.

Dedicate a song to her on your favorite station.

Body pillow that smells like your cologne.

Salt and pepper shakers from the restaurant you first had dinner at together. (I am not responsible for the legal ramifications of this.)

I am assuming a lot here. I do know women who have a hard time gift shopping. I also tried not to be heterosexist; most of these ideas can be given or received by either gender.

Christmas shouldn't stress you out. Gift giving is supposed to be fun. Think of inside jokes or special places you've been.

If all else fails, just ask what your significant other would like. After all, you didn't ever make Santa guess.

Toy selection creates multitude of choices

Cecily Rodriguez
staff reporter

If every gift whispered into ol' St. Nick's ear would somehow find its own way under the tree Christmas morning, life would be a lot less stressful. But the jolly fat man with the flying reindeer isn't around, so many people are on their own in the big bad world of toys.

So what are the ultimate toys of the season?

"There are so many this year. Some years there have been one single toy that really outdoes everything else, like the Cabbage Patch Kids craze, but this year there's not one single item," Don Spear, publicity manager for FAO Schwarz, said.

He said collectible toys and remakes of old toys have been popular with this year's early Christmas shoppers. G.I. Joe's new series of classic remakes and the ever-popular Barbie doll are some of the biggest.

"We've got the Antique Rose Barbie, the Statue of Liberty Barbie, and real popular this year is the Ken and Barbie 'Star Trek' gift set," Spear said.

Other hot items include the "Star Wars" figures, because all three of the "Star Wars" movies will be re-released in theaters next year, Spear said. And, of course, anything related to the most recent Walt Disney movies like "Toy Story" and "101 Dalmations" is going to please children.

Shoppers looking for something a little more practical will find Tickle Me Elmo to be a real crowd-pleaser with the toddlers. This furry "Sesame Street" doll asks kids to squeeze his tummy then vibrates while saying "Ooh, that tickles!" This doll can be found at Toys 'R Us, Kay-Bee Toys or Wal-Mart for around $40.

But, if you really want to get in good with kiddies this Christmas, the gift to get is Nintendo's latest Nintendo 64 System. This game sells for more than $200.

A Wal-Mart employee said the system includes one game controller but does not include any games. There are only two games available in stores right now, but four should be available by Christmas. The games cost $60 each.

"It's real popular now and real hard to get a hold of," Bev Jeffris, a Toys 'R Us employee, said. "You won't be able to get it without a pre-sell ticket, and that's just to reserve it. You have to get the pre-sell ticket before it comes in. Otherwise it's impossible to get a hold of. In order to reserve it customers have to pay $25 down."

Shoppers should remember Christmas isn't what it used to be.

"If people can escape the toy aisle paying less than $50 or $60, they're lucky. I wish Santa was real, but not for my kids' sake, for my wallet's," Jessica Emrick, mother of two, said.

THE SEASON OF CARING

Tree benefits child literacy

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

For those who have contracted the generosity bug this holiday season, there is one way to give to children and promote literacy.

The K-State Student Union will have its Angel Tree up from today to Dec. 18 to participate in the Angel Tree Book Project.

The tree will be filled with angels bearing children's names, ages and genders.

A K-State Union Bookstore visitor can select an angel from the tree and purchase a book for the child.

Von Oneil, sales associate at the Union Book-store, said donors will receive a 25-percent discount when purchasing the book and a star with the donor's name will replace the angel. Donors may remain anonymous if they choose.

Last year, all of the angels on the tree were replaced with stars.

"We had around 200 chil-

K-State provides international holiday opportunity

ALLISON WOODALL
staff reporter

Not all students will be toasting eggnog and decking the halls with family this year.

Distance, money and intersession classes keep many K-State students from going home for the holidays.

International students often find traveling home impossible but view spending the holidays in the United States as an opportunity.

"I will miss my home and family, of course," Peter Burian, junior in electrical engineering, said. "But on the other hand, I can learn about an American Christmas."

Burian is from the Czech Republic and is spending his first holiday season away from home. He applied to the Christmas International House program and said he hopes to stay in Georgia.

The International House program offers accommodations from Dec. 20 to Jan. 2 across the nation to international college students who cannot travel home. Students live with a host family, and the only costs are a $35 registration fee and travel expenses.

Another program offered to international students is sponsored by Helping International Students. HIS sponsors International House Party at Bear Trap Ranch in Colorado.

Bob Taussig, HIS coordinator, said the camp allows international students to explore American culture and provides an alternative to spending the holidays alone.

"For some, Christmas here is a real culture shock," Taussig said. "Plus, it's just a lonesome, sad time for students far away from their families."

The Christmas International House Party will be Dec. 22-28, and the New Year's International House Party will be Dec. 29-Jan. 4. Students can only attend one camp, and the cost for registration, meals and lodging is $235.

A housing option for K-State residence-hall students is Marlatt Hall fourth floor. The space is used during the semester for guest rooms and Campus organizations adopt families for holidays

KELLY KIEFER
staff reporter

K-State students and organizations are making Christmas wishes come true by joining the Adopt A Family program.

Adopt A Family is a program organized by the Flint Hills Breadbasket to provide Christmas presents for children who would not otherwise have presents under the tree.

Families signed up the first week in November at the Flint Hills Breadbasket to become adopted families. The sign-up sheets list age, gender and clothing size of each child in a family as well as children's Christmas wishes.

When a family is adopted, a donor family or organization is given the wish list.

"You have everything. You can choose to do one thing for each child, you can choose to do the whole list, you can choose to do whatever it is that you want," Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said.

The method in which donors adopt a family is entirely up to them, Bramhall said. Donors can go as far as doing all the shopping, wrapping and delivery of gifts to a family on their own, or as little as giving money and having volunteers do the rest.

"Wherever donors drop off, that's where we take over, and that is the beauty of the program," Bramhall said.

If donors do not have enough time to buy gifts, they can send a check with "Adopt A Family" in the memo for Flint Hills Breadbasket documentation.

"We have secret Santas that are just waiting to go and spend someone else's money for these children," Bramhall said.

Bramhall said donors can shop and wrap gifts, but remain anonymous, if they choose.

"We have Santa Claus deliver them," she said.

If donor families want to deliver gifts to their adopted family and take their children along, precautions are taken to avoid awkward or embarrassing situations for donors or receivers. It is required of adopted families and donors to tell what school their children attend.

"We want to make absolutely positive that those children do not go to the same school," Bramhall said.

Several K-State organizations and living groups have adopted families through the program. The K-State Union Bookstore was one such donor last year.

Jean Johnston, Union Bookstore cashier, said she is looking forward to adopting a family with the Union Bookstore again this year. She was the contact person last year and is doing the same this year.

Johnston said some Union Bookstore employees brought specific items and others donated money last year. The group was able to meet all of the wishes of the three-child family it adopted.

"We managed to sneak (the presents) in before the children got home from school," she said.

Ford Hall adopted two families last year and also made personal deliveries.

Jennifer Cink, junior in elementary education and resident assistant in Ford, said Ford staff members organized for the entire hall to work together.

Enough money was raised to adopt two families, each with two children.

"It was really neat, because we ended up getting almost everything on each list," Cink said.

With remaining money, Ford bought gift certificates from Dillons, Hair Experts Design Team, and the Children's Book Shop to give to the families.

Cink said she hopes the hall can adopt a family again this year.

"We really had a great time with it," she said.

Holiday season more than Christmas, some celebrate Hanukkah

Charle Sioux Charleton
staff writer

Christmas is not the only holiday people celebrate in December. Jewish people celebrate Hanukkah, the Festival of Lights.

"Hanukkah is celebrated in the home, and each family does things a little differently," Deborah Fedders, activities director for B'nai B'rith Hillel, the Jewish student organization, said. "It's a bigger deal than when I was growing up. It is more commercialized now."

The main activity is lighting the Menorah, a candelabra that has a place for nine candles. The central candle is used to light the other eight, and one candle is lit each night. The idea, Fedders said, is to try to dispel the darkness of a winter's night.

The Jewish calendar goes by the moon instead of the sun, so sometimes Hanukkah coincides with Christmas. This year the first candle will be lit at night on Dec. 5.

"In some families, one person lights the candles every night. In other families, a different person lights the candles each time," she said.

Fedders said she gave gifts that had something to do with the Judaism. One example of a gift is the dreidel.

Children of all ages play with dreidels, a top created with four flat surfaces. Each side carries a Hebrew letter. The letters stand for "A Great Miracle Happened There," referring to the origins of the Hanukkah celebration.

Hanukkah books are a popular item for children. In Manhattan, they can be found at Varney's Book Store and the Children's Book Store in Aggieville. Waldenbooks at the Manhattan Town Center carries them also.

"In my own household when my children were little they did get a treat each night. They got gifts from our relatives so we let them decide which gift to open what night. That way they weren't overwhelmed with opening them all at once," Fedders said.

Some items can be ordered from catalogs that sell Judaic items, such as dreidels, jewelry and artwork, but more often people order gifts through the gift shop at their local synagogue.

At the Manhattan Jewish Congregation Synagogue, the gift shop person who orders for Hanukkah is Mireille Green. This year she ordered small gifts, like inexpensive jewelry, window decorations or candles, as well as larger gifts, like Menorahs.

"Like any other gift-giving occasion, every family does it differently," Green said. "Hanukkah is not the major holiday people think it is."

Fedders said her father's generation grew up in Europe and were not materialistic, so the treats were little — like a piece of fruit or the European equivalent of a penny.

Now, children are given geld, which is a gold coin candy. They are covered with gold foil on the outside and inside is a chocolate coin.

"The two items ordered the most for Hanukkah are geld and dreidels," Green said.

For those who send cards, Rod's Hallmark Shop in Westloop and the Palace Cards and Gifts in Aggieville carry Hanukkah cards. Hanukkah music is available at Streetside Records in Aggieville.

Think safe thoughts as you select a tree

BRANCH OF SAFETY

Kelly Kiefer
staff reporter

Oh, Christmas tree, oh, Christmas tree, how flammable your branches.

Picking out a Christmas tree can be a chore, but taking the time to choose a fresh one may save you from fighting a fire in your living room later.

Lesa Sailor, garden store manager at Blueville Nursery, said the most important thing to do when picking out a tree is to pull on the needles.

"Go back from the branch about six inches and pull on the needles a little bit," Sailor said. "If it's pretty tight, that means it's a pretty fresh tree."

"If they start coming off real easy, then you know the tree's been cut for a while," she said.

Buying a tree that has already been cut requires a little bit of work when it gets home.

"If you buy one off a lot, where it has been leaning up against a building or something, they're not going to have the bottom cut off," Sailor said.

Before putting a tree in a stand, about one-half inch needs to be cut from the bottom of the trunk to allow moisture in.

"Most of the time you just take a regular tree saw and cut about one-half inch off the bottom," Sailor said.

"If you're cutting it at a tree lot or something and then taking it home, you really should put a wet paper towel or something over the end, because instantly, the tree's natural tendency is to heal over any wound," she said.

Depending on the size of tree stand used, a tree will drink the whole container of water at first. After a while, it takes less.

"The important thing is to keep water in it all the time, and you really need to check it daily," Sailor said.

Sailor said one way to keep a tree moist is to spray it with an antitranspirant, Wilt-Proof, which coats the needles of a tree and keeps moisture in. Wilt-Proof also makes trees shiny, she said.

Some tree owners claim to keep a tree healthy by feeding it preservatives, which Sailor says is not likely to work.

"Some people swear they put some sort of honey thing. Some people put aspirin in their water and some people put these liquid premix things in there," she said.

"From everything I've seen and the research that I've read from Christmas-tree growers, that if you just put water in there, that is just fine."

Proper placement of a tree can keep it from drying out quickly.

Fire Marshal Donald Francis of the Manhattan Fire Department said it is important to keep trees away from furnaces, furnace vents, and direct sunlight, which dry out trees.

Candles and any type of open flame are dangerous to trees. Lights are also a source of heat that can dry out a tree, especially large bulbs.

"It's usually better to use the low voltage lights, because they don't get as hot," he said.

If the cord of a string of lights is damaged, Francis said it is not a good idea to try to fix it. For as little as they cost, buying new lights is a safer option.

If using an extension cord, make sure it is heavy, grounded and does not have a multiple-outlet end. Cords with multiple outlets are easily overloaded.

"If possible, don't use an extension cord at all, and plug lights in directly," Francis said.

If students are looking for a hassle-free tree option, a Norfolk Island Pine might be the answer. These miniature trees are an indoor variety that need a very warm climate and ample light to survive, perfect for apartment or residence-hall dwellers.

"The smallest is a six-inch pot that could sit on a table easily," Sailor said. "Then, we have them all the way up to about three to four feet tall."

Cut trees can cost as little as $25 and as much as $40 and above. The Norfolk Island Pines start at $11.98 at Blueville Nursery.

will house 103 residents.

Phil Schlee, guest services coordinator, said the application deadline to stay in Marlatt is Dec. 13. Applications will be available at the residence halls' front desks, and they can be turned in there. Posters should be up around the residence halls about this after Thanksgiving break. Residents will be billed for the cost of staying during break.

Students taking intersession classes must cut their breaks short and return to Manhattan as well.

Aaron Scaffidi, sophomore in electrical engineering, took intersession courses last January and stayed in his fraternity, Delta Sigma Phi. He said his house is one of the few that stays open, but many greeks who live in-house stay in friends' apartments during intersession.

Scaffidi said a disadvantage of taking intersession classes is a long spring semester.

"Intersession itself is not that bad," Scaffidi said. "But mid-semester, you feel like you have been in class forever, and you wonder where your break went."

Be sure to shop your local Manhattan merchants this holiday season.

Hunt down holidays on World Wide Web

ALLISON WOODALL
staff reporter

website review

'Tis the season to surf the Internet.

Signs of the season are appearing everywhere, and the Internet is no exception. Web browsers can find information about traditions, recipes and even sounds to put them in the holiday mood.

Kids are getting into the Internet holiday spirit by posting their own sites.

Seven-year-old Heather has created "Heather's Happy Holidaze, For Kids Only," (http://www.shadeslanding.com/hms/) with games to play for each holiday. Heather creates the concepts for the site, and her parents take care of the html coding.

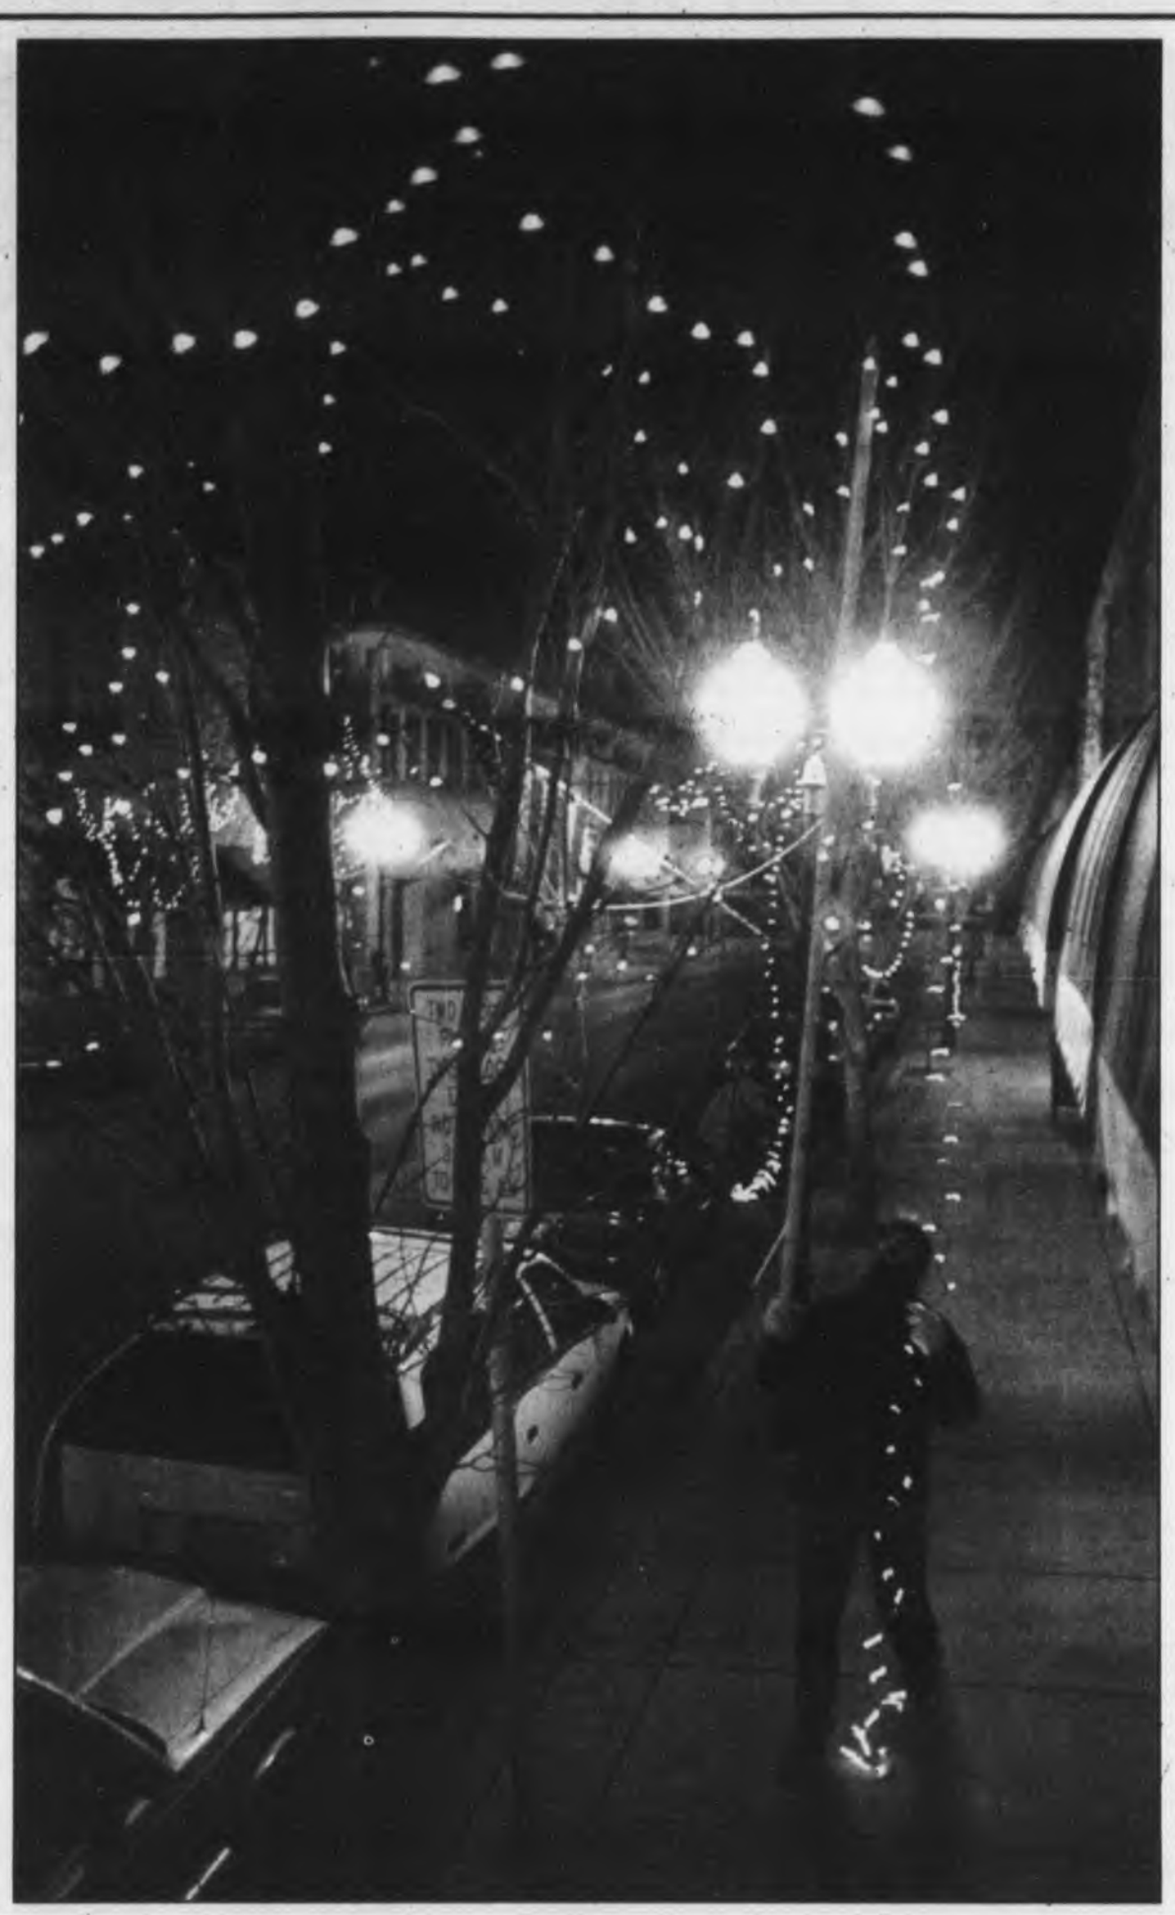
Christian traditions are not the only holiday sites found on the Net.

Mid-winter celebrations were common, even before Christmas was celebrated on Dec. 25. Browsers can learn about the Feast of the Ass and the Buddhist New Year Butter Sculpture Festival at (http://www.maui.net/~mcculc/xmas.htm).

Find information on the Jewish holiday of Hanukkah at (http://members.aol.com/halleluyah/hanukkah.htm). This site explains to net surfers the history of Hanukkah.

Swiety Mikolaj, the Swedish Santa Claus, can be found on the Polish Homepage, (http://www.infocom.net/~romanm/xmas.html). Also listed are traditional Polish Christmas recipes.

While cooking, holiday music to fill the air can be found at (http://www3.pair.com/montrsmu/). Surfers can read the histories of the carols, browse the reviews, listen to the sound clips, or test their knowledge with a quiz.



Disbelievers can reaffirm their doubts with a scientific Santa Claus analysis at (http://gensys.com/~olotcf/santa.html).

On a final, more practical note, and particularly useful during the holiday season is United Parcel Service at (www.ups.com/news/track1.html). Requests can be made for package pickup, and package-tracking services are available.

names, and books were purchased for each of the kids," Oneil said.

Oneil said the Union Bookstore gets the names of children from the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

When the program is complete, the Union Bookstore sends the angels and books to the Flint Hills Breadbasket, which delivers the books to the children.

This is the third year the Union Bookstore has participated in the Angel Tree Book Project.

The program was started by Workman Publishing, who approached the Union Bookstore with the project, Oneil said.

"It's a way to promote literacy and get books in children's hands," she said.

Setting up the tree today will coincide with National Children's Book week, from today to Nov. 22.

The Collegian extends its holiday wishes to the students and their families this holiday season.

Students should remember to mail those special holiday packages early

LILLIAN BEEBE
staff reporter

Students who are playing Santa Claus through the mail to friends and relatives need to start thinking ahead about mailing with the holiday season approaching.

"It's best to think early so you don't get hung up in a line somewhere at the last minute," Al Polson, owner of the Mail Center, said.

Students have a variety of mailing options and locations in Manhattan.

If cost is an issue, Cheryl Smith at Mail Boxes Etc. offers a suggestion.

"If you can call with an approximate weight and a ZIP code, we can give you an estimate," she said.

The U.S. Postal Service provides parcel post, express mail, priority mail and international mail services.

Parcel post is fourth-class mail and the cheapest. Cost is determined by package weight.

Ken Olsen, customer service supervisor at the Manhattan Post Office, suggests students should try to have parcel post packages mailed by the second week of December. The earlier, the better, he said.

Priority mail is first-class mail. Its cost is also determined by weight and is more expensive.

To beat the rush, students should have priority-mail packages mailed by the third week of December.

Express mail is next-day mail. Packages cost $10.75 for the first 8 ounces and increase in price based on weight, Olsen said.

Like the U.S. Postal Service, United Parcel Service offers several mailing options.

UPS regular ground service prices are based on weight of the package and the ZIP code it's going to.

Three-day select, second-day air and next-day air are all air-mail options for packages with destinations in the United States. Price for these is based on two kinds of weight, actual weight and dimensional weight, Pansy Price, Mail Center employee, said.

Actual weight is the weight of the box, and dimensional weight is the length, height and width of the box.

If the dimensional weight is greater than the actual weight, you pay the higher of the two prices, Price said.

All these services have guaranteed delivery except during the holidays, when only next-day air is guaranteed, she said.

UPS has a 150-pound weight limit on individual packages, Smith said. It also recommends customers not mail cash or flammable items such as aerosol cans and cigarette lighters, she said.

Both UPS and U.S. Postal Service offer international mail coverage.

International mail has many restrictions placed upon it by individual countries' customs regulations.

Both Smith and Olsen recommend customers mailing internationally go to the post office or UPS, because they have the proper paperwork and know the regulations.

Olsen said that if students using the U.S. Postal Service want packages to arrive abroad in time for Christmas, they need to have them air-mailed between Dec. 2-9.

The UPS hot line, 1-800-742-5877, said international packages would take about seven to eight days to get to their destinations.

Mail Boxes Etc. and the Mail Center offer packing services. They will pack and ship packages for customers. The rates are based on the size of the item and how fragile it is. Both size and fragility affect the size of the box and amount of packing used.

"Our packing price at Mail Center varies between $2 and $15 depending on how fragile the item is," Price said.

Price has a few suggestions for people packing their own parcels.

Put a piece of paper or index card with the mailing address on it inside the top of the box before mailing, especially if the box will be wrapped in brown paper, she said.

It's also best to wrap gift boxes containing clothing in plastic bags before packing them to protect them from any dampness, Price said.

Have at least 2 inches of packing around fragile items, she said.

If an item is especially fragile, Price said, get the item securely packed in a small box. Then place the small box inside the mailing box with at least 2 inches of packing around it.

Police find link in slayings

SPEED

▶ Two women killed five months apart in Johnson County could have been killed by the same man, police investigators said.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SHAWNEE — Police investigating the slayings of two young Johnson County women five months apart say both were with the same man just before they were killed.

"We're dealing with an individual who may have killed twice," Johnson County District Attorney Paul Morrison said Friday. "That's real scary stuff, and we're concerned about catching this person before it happens again."

Police would not describe the sort of contact Rebecca Carlson, 21, or April Sima, 16, had with their killer, but the contact left physical evidence indicating both victims were with the same man.

"These crime scenes are linked, and we can prove that," Morrison said.

Sima was killed May 29 at her home in Olathe, and Carlson died Nov. 14 at her Shawnee apartment. Investigators stopped short of saying that the two were killed by the same man.

"We can put the same person at both of these scenes," Morrison said. "That's a little bit different from saying the same person is the killer."

> "We can put the same person at both of these scenes. That's a little bit different from saying the same person is the killer."
> • PAUL MORRISON
> JOHNSON COUNTY ATTORNEY

Carlson and Sima do not appear to have known each other, but their deaths have similarities.

They were both found dead in bedrooms of their homes on weekday afternoons. They attended Olathe East High School. They were both popular and moved in wide social circles. Each appears to have let her killer into her home, and investigators found evidence at both scene of slaying of sexual activity.

"One of the similarities with both of the scenes is there was no forced entry, and you can draw your own conclusion from that," Morrison said.

Metro Squad members do not think either slaying was random.

"We're looking at a lot of different angles in these," squad spokesman Dan Cline said. "So just because we're looking at sexual things doesn't mean that we're looking at a serial rapist."

Carlson and Sima spent time in different kinds of places; Carlson frequented dance clubs, and Sima liked to meet friends at pizza restaurants and their houses. But at least two people knew both of them.

Investigators said Friday that they had eliminated some suspects, but they would not describe whom they were still investigating closely.

Soldiers' body identified; investigation continues

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT RILEY — A soldier whose body was found on post Thursday night has been identified as Pvt. 2 Dustin H. Waters, 19, of Big Spring, Texas.

Fort Riley spokeswoman Deb Skidmore said Saturday that suspects have been apprehended in Waters' death.

The Army's Criminal Investigation Division was investigating.

Waters' body was found on the post about 10:15 p.m. Thursday. Post officials declined to release details.

Waters was assigned to Battery B, 4th Battalion of the 1st Field Artillery at Fort Riley. He had been at Fort Riley since January and worked as a field artilleryman.

According to obituary information from the Myers and Smith Funeral Home in Big Spring, Waters enlisted in the Army in September 1995 and had been stationed at Fort Sill, Okla., and Fort Ord, Calif., before being assigned to Fort Riley.

Academic honesty code considered

R.J. DIEPENBROCK
staff reporter

The honor-code policy, proposed by the Provost's Task Force on Academic Honesty, is being considered by the academic affairs committee.

"They are working over the policies recommended by my committee," Mitchell Strauss, task force chairman since fall 1995, said.

One of the policies outlines and defines an honor system to be implemented at K-State that would place the responsibility of honesty in the hands of the students.

"We've tweaked it a little," said Jeff Dougan, senior in electrical engineering and chair of the academic affairs committee.

The changes reflect a shift in thought.

"We have to embrace a change of attitude," Dougan said. "We have to change our attitude from cheating is acceptable, to cheating is unacceptable."

Dougan said the honor-code policy would come before Student Senate at the next meeting for a first reading.

Student Senate should vote on the policy Dec. 12, Dougan said.

Strauss said if Student Senate approves the policies, the recommendations move on to Faculty Senate.

Strauss said his hope is that once the policies are introduced, programs will be included to teach students and faculty how to work and cooperate in an honor system.

"An honor system cannot stand by itself," Strauss said. "There has to be education and commitment."

If the policy is approved by Faculty Senate, an implementation task force will take over and begin working the honor-code system into the fabric of K-State, Dougan said.

"We won't be going cold turkey," he said. "We have to change the current attitude of a proctor system. Many parties may not be able to handle the change."

Dougan said having an honor-code system will give K-State something to be proud of.

"It fosters respect," Dougan said. "Industries will hold K-State in high regard."

FEELING ENERGIZED

thousands thrill to pant the chant competition

STORY BY R.J. DIEPENBROCK

What a weekend it was for K-State.

Homecoming festivities all week long continued Friday night with Pant the Chant, float winners and a sweep by the men's and women's basketball teams.

The fans in attendance, a record 4,200 for the women's game and about 9,400 for the men's game, were entertained by the greek and residence-hall teams that participated in Pant the Chant competition.

Pant the Chant is just that — a chant or cheer. Each team must come up with a chant that is shorter than one minute. Some of the teams painted their hands, others dressed up in military fatigues and another donned red hearts cut from posterboard and tin caps.

The latter, the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team, used a "Wizard of Oz" theme, Heather Buckley, freshman in pre-medicine, said.

Consequently, the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team, which won the bodybuilding contest, found out they had won the Pant the Chant competition seconds before they had to perform bodybuilding on the Bramlage Coliseum floor during halftime of the men's game.

"It feels great," said Craig Miller, sophomore in horticulture and member of Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team. "Winning the bodybuilding, it makes it all worthwhile."

Kim Jones, junior in elementary education and Miller's teammate, said it was a good opportunity for both the greek houses and the residence halls to be able to compete together.

"Oh my God," Jones said after the Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha performance. "I feel great. It's so awesome."

The residence-hall winner of the bodybuilding competition, Strong Complex, performed during halftime of the women's game.

"I'm proud of everyone here," said Greg Fletchall, sophomore in architectural engineering and Strong Complex team member. "I'm glad I went out and did this."

Thanksgiving plans finalized throughout city

BRANDI HERTIG
staff writer

When the Pilgrims and Native Americans gave thanks after their first successful harvest, little did they realize that 375 years later, strapped-for-cash college students would be scrambling to find ways to celebrate Thanksgiving while away from home.

For students who find themselves in Manhattan during Thanksgiving, there are a few options that can provide them with a just-like-mom-would-make meal.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket is sponsoring the Manhattan Community Thanksgiving Dinner from noon-2 p.m. on Thursday at 10th and Houston streets in the Manhattan High School East Campus cafeteria. The meal is free, but donations will be accepted.

The Ramada Inn will also be host to a Thanksgiving Day dinner from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the Ramada Ballroom at 17th Street and Anderson Avenue. The cost is $12.95 for adults and $5.95 for children. The meal includes several choices of meats, salads and desserts. Reservations can be made by calling the Ramada at 539-7531 between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m.

On the flip side, there are also plenty of ways students can help the less fortunate in Manhattan.

Dillons is sponsoring a Help the Homeless program. When the cashiers ring up your groceries, you can ask them to also scan through a little paper turkey, which

NATION WORLD

• HIJACKED ETHIOPIAN AIRLINER CRASHES. A hijacked Ethiopian airliner carrying 175 people ran out of fuel and crashed into the water Saturday just off a beach on the Comoros Islands, killing at least 55 people. Island residents risked the rough waters of the Indian Ocean to search for victims. At least 51 people survived the Ethiopian Airlines crash. The Italian embassy confirmed 55 people dead and at least 16 injured.

• REPAIRS CONTINUE AT DERAILMENT SITE. Repair crews worked Sunday to rebuild heavily used railroad tracks torn up when an Amtrak passenger train derailed, jackknifed and plowed into a swamp, injuring 34 people. Amtrak hoped to have the mangled northbound track rebuilt today. Only one person, an Amtrak employee, remained hospitalized.

• APEC SUMMIT UNDER WAY. U.S. officials worked on last-minute trade deals and demonstrators protested economic inequality as Pacific Rim leaders prepared Sunday for their fourth-annual summit. Leaders of the 18-government Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation want to turn the group into the world's biggest free-trade zone. But it was uncertain what progress would be made at today's forum.

• FIRST REFUGEES ARRIVE HOME. The first exhausted refugees from camps in warring southeast Zaire limped into their homeland Sunday, after walking more than 100 miles on roads lined with corpses. While more than a half-million Rwandans have returned in the past week from forests north of Lake Kivu on the Zaire-Rwanda border, these 100 were the first to make it on the long walk from refugee camps south of the lake. U.S. reconnaissance flights show there are another 175,000 people on the move northward toward Gisenyi. In all, U.N. agencies are still expecting a potentially large number of refugees, possibly half a million.

• RESCUERS SEARCH SHARK-INFESTED WATERS FOR CRASH SURVIVORS. Rescuers hunted Saturday for survivors of an Air Force Reserve rescue plane that plunged into the frigid, shark-infested Pacific Ocean with 11 people on board. One person was rescued alive. But there were no other signs of life in the area 60 miles off the northern California coast where the Oregon-based HC-130 Hercules aircraft went down with engine trouble during a training mission Friday night. Two bodies were pulled from the 52-degree water at morning's light, leaving eight men unaccounted for.

• BORDER POLICE CHARGED WITH BEATING PALESTINIANS. Two Israeli border police officers videotaped beating Palestinians were indicted on charges of aggravated assault and abuse of power. Four other officers were charged in a similar incident.

David Ben Abu and Tsahi Shmaya were arrested last week after an amateur videotape showing them kicking and humiliating six Palestinians was broadcast on Israel Television. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said the two police officers would be discharged from the security forces.

• RUSSIAN HARLINERS CRITICIZE CHECHEN AGREEMENT. Hardliners in Russia's parliament criticized the Kremlin's latest agreement with Chechen rebels on Sunday, a day after President Boris Yeltsin ordered the last Russian troops out of the breakaway republic. Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and Aslan Maskhadov, the leader of Chechnya's coalition government, signed the accord spelling out basic principles of relations with Moscow until the separatist republic holds presidential and parliamentary elections in January. Maskhadov said the deal proved that the conflict in Chechnya could be solved peacefully and praised Yeltsin for ordering the troop removal.

SPORTS

• NEW COACH AT NOTRE DAME. Bob Davie, Notre Dame's defensive coordinator the past three years, was hired Sunday to succeed coach Lou Holtz in the glamour job of college football. It is the first head coaching job for Davie, who's spent the past 20 years as a defensive assistant. It's the first time Notre Dame has hired an assistant as head coach since 1954, when Terry Brennan replaced Frank Leahy.

• REEDY FIRED AFTER LOSS. Baylor coach Chuck Reedy was fired Sunday, one day after a blowout loss that left the Bears with their worst record since 1978 and a last-place finish in their inaugural season in the Big 12 South.

Reedy was in the fourth year of a five-year deal he received after Grant Teaff retired following the 1992 season. He received a contract extension last year, although details of that deal have been sketchy.

• DISABLED WOMEN FOUND, CARETAKER IN CUSTODY. Three disabled women who were missing with their caretaker were found late Saturday night north of downtown Kansas City, Mo., in good condition.

Caretaker Robert L. Newsome, 40, was in police custody.

The women, who require around-the-clock assistance, were classified missing along with the caretaker from an Overland Park apartment after a relief worker arrived late Friday and found them gone. They had last been seen Friday afternoon.

• GARDEN CITY YOUTH CONVICTED OF MURDER. A Garden City teen-ager was convicted of first-degree murder in last winter's killing of a man he confronted at a party. A jury in Finney County District Court deliberated just a short time Friday before finding Adam Valdez, 17, guilty of murder, kidnapping, robbery and other counts.

The victim, Juan Jose Ayon, 33, was found dead last Feb. 4 in an abandoned sand pit.

Authorities said the crime began with a confrontation at a party between Ayon, Valdez and a third youth, Jose Avalos, identified by prosecutors as a fellow member of a gang with Valdez.

Ayon was beaten, put in his car, driven outside the city and run over several times. Avalos, 15, pleaded guilty earlier to murder. Both teens now await sentencing.

• EMPORIA MAN CONVICTED IN 1994 ACCIDENT. An Emporia man has been convicted of involuntary manslaughter in a 1994 traffic accident that killed his passenger.

Lyon County jurors reached the verdict Friday against Delbert C. Nelson Jr., 39.

He was charged in the death of Grover McGuire Jr., 26, who died of severe head injuries when the car Nelson was driving hit a parked flatbed truck in Emporia on Thanksgiving weekend.

Nelson also was charged with driving under the influence in the wreck. Sentencing was set for Feb. 14. Nelson faces up to 11 years and three months in prison.

Pet intensive care

Staff, students assist late-night emergencies

CLIF PALMBERG/Collegian

JEFF LOWERY and Valerie Sadler listen to William Graham explain the seizure his dog, Ike, had earlier in the day. Sadler is an intern in the Veterinarian Medicine Complex.

BETH HUSTED
staff reporter

It's 2:30 a.m., and you've just accidentally hit a dog on the highway. You know the dog is hurt, but you can't think of where to take it this early in the morning.

The Veterinary Medicine Complex is always open for emergencies.

"We get all sorts of accident victims. We've had gunshot victims, some of which were deliberate," said Linda Rohs, referral coordinator for the emergency room at the Veterinary Medicine Complex. "We've also had cruelty cases, antifreeze-ingestion cases and cases where police will want to have certain animals put down for various reasons."

ODD JOBS
PART OF A CONTINUING SERIES

Several of the patients that must be seen after hours are horses suffering from colic.

One of the most severe and relatively common cases the hospital receives is antifreeze-ingestion victims.

"This is very fatal for most animals, so it is important to catch it as early as possible. As for the new environmentally safe antifreezes, we really don't know that much about them yet," Rohs said.

Although any emergency patient is welcome, the staff prefers owners call the hospital first so it can prepare the charts and equipment the animal might need.

"We usually take in the most critically ill or traumatic cases after hours. There is also a 24-hour staff for the ICU," Rohs said.

There is always one person in the intensive care unit, and there are eight-hour shifts during the day.

From 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., there is usually more than one veterinary medicine student working.

Throughout the day, veterinary medicine students and clinicians will stop in to check on their patients.

"The only time there is no one in the ICU is when there are no patients. Otherwise, students or clinicians must have someone spell them before they can leave the ICU for any reason. But we usually have at least one patient in the ICU," Rohs said.

Most of the patients who use the emergency services are the hospital's own patients.

However, it occasionally gets patients from other doctors because they are closed, and the patient is usually transferred back the next day.

"At night, we are basically the control center. Every phone call comes to us. Our biggest thing is to have the owner call ahead so we can prepare and type out their case record to help ready the clinicians and students. Once we had a student come racing out with a gurney for a kitten, because he didn't know what to expect," Christina Foust, junior in speech and advertising, said.

For any emergency case, there is a $50 charge to have the animal examined. Having owners call ahead enables the emergency-care staff to make sure the pet really needs emergency care.

"I think one of the best parts of this job is building relations with the clients, whether through sharing their joy or comforting them when something happens," Foust said.

Student rider featured in Kemper horse show

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

Riding horses can take you further than just down the road. At least it did for one K-State student from Topeka.

Alyssa Tolin, freshman in business, got an opportunity to ride her 13-year-old Morgan horse, Fun Quest Summit, in the American Royal's Concert of Champions on Nov. 18.

The Concert of Champions is an honor to ride in, Tolin said. It is a prestigious preview of the American Royal horse show.

"It is basically a 2-1/2 hour concert performed by the Kansas City Youth Symphony. About every breed of horse imaginable is represented," Tolin said.

While the music is playing, past and present national and world champions as well as other title-holders parade around the arena.

"I was asked to represent the junior-exhibitor division, which is for 18-year-olds and under," Tolin said.

Sharon Tolin, Alyssa Tolin's mother, said Alyssa Tolin had a lot of success and good times at horse shows.

"It was a real honor to have been asked and perform under the spotlights in Kemper Arena, no doubt about that," Sharon Tolin said.

"It was a big thrill. It was a very exciting thing. It was different from the show-ring experience."

Alyssa Tolin was asked to ride because she received the Reserve World Champion Morgan award last year in Oklahoma City during the weeklong grand national show.

"The best moment in my showing career was winning the reserve title last year. The show started out with around 50 riders, and the judges narrowed it down to five riders. I just happened to be second," Alyssa Tolin said.

> "I went with some of my friends from Lawrence to a show. I fell in love with the horses and the people, and we began looking for a horse."
> FRESHMAN IN BUSINESS

Alyssa Tolin has been riding and showing her Morgans for about 10 years, but she wasn't always interested in showing.

"I went with some of my friends from Lawrence to a show. I fell in love with the horses and the people, and we began looking for a horse," Alyssa Tolin said.

After Alyssa Tolin found a horse, she began training. To prepare for the show circuit, Alyssa Tolin spent weeks and weekends with her instructor, Gina Pruetz of Dallas.

Pruetz offers helpful tips on things to improve upon.

"Everyone looks for something different. She gives me tips for different shows and lets me know what certain judges are looking for," Alyssa Tolin said.

Sharon Tolin said the family is involved with horses.

"We've raised Morgans as a family and hope to keep it as a family tradition," she said.

Alyssa Tolin used to ride every day as practice for her as well as her horse. However, the circuit is finished for the year. Show season runs from Easter weekend until the second weekend in October, which is the world show in Oklahoma, Alyssa Tolin said.

"Right now, I am looking for a new horse," Alyssa Tolin said.

She plans to continue showing on the amateur circuit throughout college, but mostly during summer shows. School is taking a lot out of her showing time.

"The opportunities in showing are endless. You meet so many people," she said.

United Way fund drive experiences low rate of donations

SCOTT CONNER
staff reporter

Contributions to the United Way from faculty and staff at K-State have declined this year.

Ailleen Cray, executive director of United Way of Riley County, said contributions have been declining in past years. This year's contributions are at the lowest rate she has seen in years.

Cray said an estimated 25 percent of K-State's faculty and staff have contributed in past years, but only about 9 percent have contributed this year.

Contributions to the local United Way help fund many programs that are directly involved with the K-State campus and the community.

Cray said contributions help fund organizations such as the Crisis Center and local youth organizations.

"It still takes money to leave the doors open," Cray said.

Sharon Davies, committee member of the K-State United Way Coordinating Committee, said the United Way fund drive starts each year with a letter that is sent out to every faculty and staff member on campus and explains how they can contribute to the United Way.

Davies said the committee plans to send fliers, in addition to the letters, to help promote contributions.

"I really can't think of any reason why contributions are down this year," Davies said.

Mark Edwards, director of Derby Food Center, said he wasn't aware of any different campaign strategies to heighten awareness of the fund drive.

Aside from envelopes showing up in our employees' mailboxes, there hasn't been any different promotions this year than in past years," Edwards said.

IN OUR OPINION

'Tis the season to give to those less fortunate

There's only a couple of days until Thanksgiving, and then it's the biggest shopping day of the year.

Nearly a month until Christmas.

You're panicked. How are you going to get all that Christmas shopping done?

Whoa! Slow down. While you're getting the wish lists together, there are people in Manhattan who have wish lists that can't be fulfilled.

WHY WE CARE

The holiday season is officially upon us. Even the smallest random act of kindness might make a big difference in another's life.

At least not without help. Your help.

It's the season of caring, and it's time to start caring. It can be as simple as giving someone a ride to the grocery store (or as far away as Garden City for Thanksgiving).

It can be as small as donating a few hours in the next month to talking with senior citizens at a nearby center.

Don't have the time? Try this: While you're grocery shopping, buy one more can of green beans. As the check-out clerk sweeps it across the scanner and the sacker asks "Paper or plastic?" simply say for the can to be left out. Why? So you can drop it in the Flint Hills Breadbasket barrel outside the store. Another family might be able to use that can of green beans to make a meal for Thanksgiving.

Plan on buying your nephew a stuffed bear for Christmas? Slide down the aisle a couple of feet, and pick up a smaller stuffed bear that could make somebody's child a warm friend Christmas morning. Wal-Mart and the Riley County Police Department are collecting gifts for Toys for Tots, just in case you were wondering what to do with the extra bear.

It's only a month until Christmas. Your shopping excursions will be tough. At least you can shop. So, help those who can't. It's a gift that you can give yourself.

The neverending struggle between idealism and ambition

This is the second in a two-part series. The first part ran Nov. 18.

Do ideals have a place in this market-driven, success-worshiping world?

Exploring the connection between ideals and ambition in the same breath raises a lot of eyebrows.

My two columns are not about personality differences as much as they are about the differences, struggles and dilemmas any remotely ambitious person feels with the concept of ideals. And living up to them in their quest for success. Or sacrificing them in their quest for success.

Before going any further, let me relate yet another incident from my past.

A dear friend and a competitor of mine in India once was faced with a significant ethical dilemma. She ran a sales promotions agency and had more than 50 temporary staff members working for her. It was a competitive industry, and there was always a fear she would lose her staff if she couldn't provide yearlong employment to them.

July, August, September and October were dry months for the business, because Bombay has severe rains during this period, and most companies prefer not to launch any new products for fear of damage to their goods.

In the midst of this, she got a call from a cigarette company. The price it offered her was phenomenal. Also the fact that she had no other job lined up for her employees and would make practically no money for the next four months did not really register in her mind.

All she knew was cigarette smoking was injurious to health and for her to propagate smoking was ethically wrong, both from a professional and personal point of view. She did not think twice about refusing the job. She stood by what she believed in.

And she paid a heavy price for it.

All her staff members simply up and quit. They joined another agency that took on the job my friend refused.

An agency that was started with the best of interests closed in a matter of eight months.

You get what you deserve, they say.

Sometimes you also end up getting what you don't deserve.

How does one make choices then? In the toss-up between eking out a living, trying to succeed (where it is the survival of the fittest) and practicing your ideals in the real world, where does one draw the line? Can you draw a line at all?

I am not advocating lying and cheating as a way of life here. Please do not misunderstand. I am also reminded of my uncle at times like this. He is a man who always believed in his ideals and has lived by them.

At last count he had changed jobs more than 40 times — all in the name of principles. And after 25 years in the job market, he is still only an executive in a TV company.

But he is also one of the happiest, most fulfilled people I have ever met in my life.

I remember a class I took last fall, Ethics in Mass Communications. It was a class full of happy and enthusiastic young people who were still to go into the real world and get jobs, work under deadlines and boss pressures. Most of them had no real experience of the working world.

For someone who returned to school from the real world, I appeared almost jaded, not to mention cynical. Each time students in my class talked about ethics in advertising and journalism, I would blank out in sheer wonderment.

Though I had a lot of respect for their ideas, I never understood how well-meaning ideas of morality and ethics really worked out in a cutthroat world of business and money. And there were few people in class who did not want to be successes in their fields. Every time I went against the flow, I was branded as an overambitious rabblerouser whose morals and ethics (if any) were always suspect.

I have lost count of the number of times people similar to me have been branded ruthless, cruel, manipulative, capitalistic, selfish, immoral. The scary part is, maybe all of it is true. I can think of examples when I have been all of the above and more.

Should minorities in this country be idealistic and believe everyone in this country has equal rights, and eventually they would find their rightful place under the sun?

Or as a friend suggested to another driven minority friend of mine hunting for a job, should they be practical and use her exoticism and minority status to her benefit? In short, use the system to work for her instead of letting it bog her down.

And if she did that, would she have to live with being called ruthless, manipulative and ambitious?

If so, is that wrong?

What is better, I wonder?

Living in a dream world?

Or making your dreams come true?

Richard Bach in "The Bridge Across Forever" said, "From time to time, it's fun to close our eyes, and in that dark say to ourselves: I am the sorcerer, and when I open my eyes, I shall see a world that I have created and for which I and only I am completely responsible."

How true.

You can learn a lot about people when you're sick and tired

MY

Mary Renee SMITH

If you don't have your health, you don't have anything.

Lately I don't have a damn thing. I am sick and tired of being sick and tired. I have been ill now for more than two weeks.

Please excuse me if this is rambling and incoherent, but I am approaching the overdose levels of more than a few medications.

During the course of this incredibly long illness. I have come to a few important conclusions I feel compelled to share.

This first is about relationships. My boyfriend and I have been together for a little while now. We have met each other's families. We have done laundry together. We have hung out with the other's friends.

But the true test of any relationship comes when you are sick.

Part of the trials of this past two weeks included food poisoning. If you have never had the unpleasant experience, let me give you a brief rundown.

It involves quite a bit of vomiting and other unfashionable gastrointestinal problems. You feel like you are going to die. Actually, you feel it would be a blessing if you did die.

I, and I hate to be so graphic here, threw my guts up all over my bathroom. After a trip to the emergency room, my boyfriend went to the store to purchase the normal array of vomit-proof foods and beverages for me. Then, bless his soul, he cleaned up the mess in the bathroom.

My mother's response to hearing this tale of kindness was, "Marry this man."

I have to agree. There is love, and then there is love. I love my sister, but it would be a cold day in hell before I would clean up her puke off the bathroom floor.

Being sick also puts a huge damper on your sex life. We have both been cursed with the flu, so lately our idea of a romantic evening is turning the humidifier on high and toasting each other with NyQuil.

While we are talking about NyQuil, my second conclusion — being sick costs money. Thank God for Lafene Health Center. If I would have had to pay for every doctor visit, I would be living in a cardboard box outside the K-State Student Union.

But I still had to buy a humidifier, tons of fruit juice, more soup than I'd like to think about, Saltine crackers and a variety of cold remedies. Kmart's pharmacy department has been supported exclusively by me for the last month.

The third important thing I have learned is never to assume there will be a parking space behind Lafene. I have made more than a few visits there during the past few weeks and have yet to get a space there.

Lafene is a wonderful place. The people are friendly, and it doesn't smell like most other doctors' offices. It is beginning to feel a little like "Cheers" lately — everybody knows my name.

But I have a few suggestions.

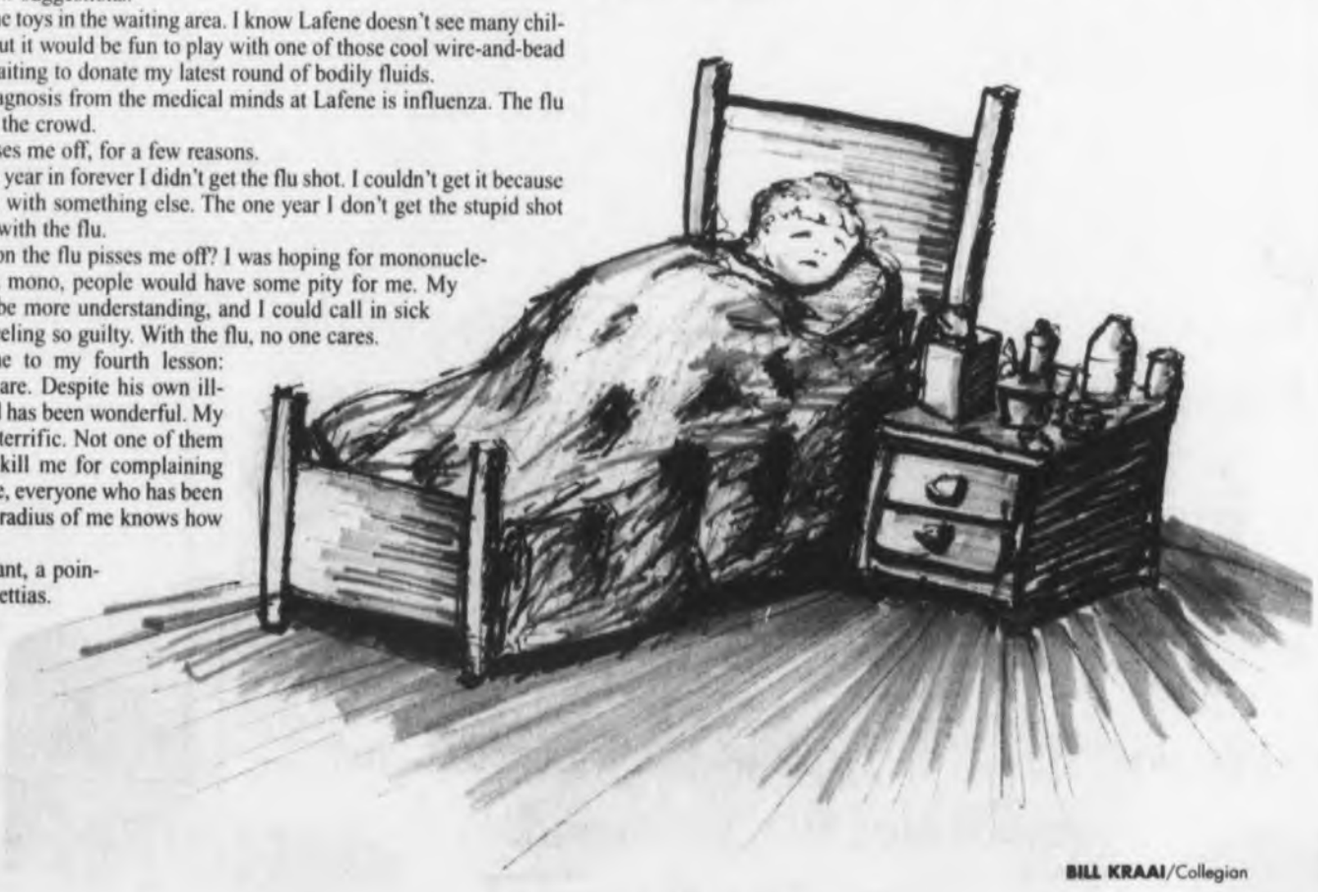
They need some toys in the waiting area. I know Lafene doesn't see many children as patients, but it would be fun to play with one of those cool wire-and-bead toys while I am waiting to donate my latest round of bodily fluids.

The current diagnosis from the medical minds at Lafene is influenza. The flu for you laymen in the crowd.

This really pisses me off, for a few reasons.

This is the first year in forever I didn't get the flu shot. I couldn't get it because I was already sick with something else. The one year I don't get the stupid shot and I come down with the flu.

The other reason the flu pisses me off? I was hoping for mononucleosis. At least with mono, people would have some pity for me. My professors would be more understanding, and I could call in sick to work without feeling so guilty. With the flu, no one cares.



That brings me to my fourth lesson: People really do care. Despite his own illness, my boyfriend has been wonderful. My friends have been terrific. Not one of them has threatened to kill me for complaining too much. Trust me, everyone who has been within a two-mile radius of me knows how sick I am.

I even got a plant, a poinsettia. I love poinsettias. (Thanks, Paul.)

Now that I am beginning to feel better, the real work begins. I am so far behind in my classes, it will take the rest of the semester to catch up. I have been doing just what it takes to get by at work. I have another part-time job I haven't done any work for in a while, and there are still two more weeks of columns left in the semester.

I don't have my health, but now I know who my friends are, I have figured out a few things about my boyfriend, and I feel I have gotten more than my money's worth out of Lafene.

Beat the odds this holiday season

Editor,

With the holiday season fast approaching, drunken driving is truly a concern of mine. Someone is killed in an alcohol-related crash every 24 minutes on our roads.

During the holiday season, these rates go up alarmingly. I think we really need to be aware of this problem. About two of every five people in the United States will be involved in an alcohol-related crash at some time in their lives. Alcohol-related accidents are the leading cause of death among people 16-24 years old.

Blood-alcohol level is the percent of alcohol in your blood. Minors receive a DUI if their blood-alcohol level is higher than .02 percent. With the blood-alcohol level of .08-.10 percent, you are legally drunk in Kansas.

For a 180-pound man, this is five drinks in one hour. For a 140-pound woman, this is three drinks in one hour. A drink equals a 12-ounce beer, a cocktail with 1-1/4 ounces of 80-proof hard alcohol or 4 ounces of wine. Please be careful this holiday season. When you go out and drink, make sure you have some type of designated driver. Let's keep drunken drivers off the road and beat the odds.

Collegian editorial board unfair about military sexual harassment

Editor,

This is my third attempt at responding to the Collegian editorial board's editorial. I was told my first attempt was lost. Then I was told my letter was too lengthy. The third time is the charm, right?

We have all heard that the pen is mightier than the sword, but we often don't consider that, just as the sword does, the pen leaves wounds. In writing about sexual harassment in the military, particularly Fort Riley, the editorial board wielded its pen and left some gaping wounds. When I tried to treat those wounds, the editor handed me a box of Band-Aids. I'll do my best, but Band-Aids are a poor substitute for gashes that need stitches.

Slice! Commanders are the perpetrators in sexual harassment and rape in the military. Slice! Manhattan's and K-State's image of Fort Riley would improve if leaders on the base were more competent. Slice! Soldiers at Fort Riley are solely obsessed with picking up women in Aggieville.

Now for the Band-Aids. Unfortunately, some commanders are implicated in these cases. The percentage is extremely small overall. The editorial board's depiction was an insult to the hundreds upon hundreds of exemplary commanders throughout our military.

The No. 1 complaint at K-State's Office of Affirmative Action is sexual harassment. It is society's problem. Society brings the problem to the military. The military tries to fix the problem. What is the rest of society doing about it? There is much more to soldiers than you see in Aggieville. They come from your community and University, too. What is your opinion of the college men who go to Aggieville to pick up college women?

Well, I'm out of Band-Aids. That is a shame, because the editorial board continues to slice with its pens. Does anybody have a tourniquet?

Students can make a difference

Editor,

My foods and nutrition professor has asked my class to participate in a donation drive to help support Elma Bratovic, senior in architectural engineering, during her brain tumor surgery and recovery at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota. (My professor is asking for the equivalent of a few Pepsis or a pitcher of beer.)

This woman's story is in the Nov. 20 Collegian. My professor, Sharon Morcos, is asking that on Dec. 2, students who are interested in showing support to Elma give whatever they feel comfortable donating and sign a card to send to her.

I wanted to write this letter and challenge other classes to consider this idea. With the holidays looming ahead of us, there are many organizations that need monetary support from the community.

Whether you choose to help an individual whose situation warrants support, or an organization that will help many people, the small donations each student could give would add up to a substantial amount of support. If professors want to coordinate the donation times or if students want to handle the specifics, K-State could make a difference in the lives of many.

MILKING FOR EXPERIENCE

story by Heather Hjetland • photos by Sarah Potter

DAIRY RESEARCH ASSISTANT Dale Niedfeldt packages the milk into plastic bags. All milk in the residence-hall food centers is from the dairy-processing plant.

FIVE-YEAR-OLD Anna Kamerer, daughter of David Kamerer, picks out some cookies to accompany her ice cream in the dairy bar. Kamerer is an assistant professor of journalism and mass communication.

JULIE KLATT, senior in animal sciences and industry, fixes two chocolate milkshakes for a couple of customers in the dairy bar. The dairy bar is in Call Hall and is open 9:30 a.m.-5:15 p.m. Monday through Friday.

JIM DELISLE, dairy research assistant, charts down the time when the processing begins at the dairy-processing plant in Call Hall. The morning started with Delisle processing skim milk.

Dairy plant offers students chance to learn, K-State chance to earn Rich, creamy ice cream that melts in your mouth. Pure, smooth and natural milk. The tastiest milkshakes around.

These are just a few of the many treats made at K-State and sold in the Dairy Bar.

In Call Hall, you'll find something most agricultural colleges don't have.

Although there are agricultural colleges across the country, few have a pilot plant and dairy bar, said Sri Adapa, plant manager and graduate student in animal sciences and industry.

Only five to seven schools have facilities that can process this large volume of dairy products.

"It's excellent experience for students wanting to graduate from dairy science or dairy processing," he said.

Not to mention the delicious products made in the plant.

"My parents like the ice cream so much that when they come to visit, they make sure they are here before it closes," Stacey Chapman, junior in elementary education, said.

Adapa said alumni often come back to keep the tradition of eating Call Hall ice cream.

Two of the Dairy Bar's busiest days are All-University Open House and Family Weekend.

Call is not the only place you can find K-State-produced dairy products. Adapa said 85 to 90 percent of the milk processed goes to the residence halls. The K-State Student Union and Dara's Fast Lane also sell the ice cream.

Chris Green, manager of the Dara's Fast Lane on Claflin Road, said the store started carrying Call Hall ice cream because of the high quality. He also said sales have increased since Dara's changed the brand of ice cream it sells.

Since 1905, K-State has offered dairy-processing classes. In 1923, a processing plant and retail store were built in Waters Hall. These facilities were moved to Call in 1964.

The milk used to make the dairy products comes from the cows at K-State Dairy Teaching and Research Facility north of campus.

The plant processes this milk into products for sale. Two full-time employees work in the plant, which begins processing at about 6 a.m. five days a week during the fall and spring semesters.

After the raw milk is taken to Call, the cream is separated out, and the milk is standardized to whole, 2-percent or skim milk. It is then pasteurized.

The milk can be used to make other dairy products or bottled into one-gallon or half-gallon jugs for the Dairy Bar, or six-gallon dispenser bags for the residence halls.

Ice cream takes longer to make than milk, because a base mix is created and aged for 24 hours before freezing and hardening. Thirty-six flavors are sold in scoops, half gallons and three-gallon tubs.

Each year, the plant creates new flavors. Last summer's additions were mango, pineapple, lemon and espresso.

Adapa said the most popular flavors are Swiss chocolate almond, butter pecan and K-State purple pride, which is blueberry.

The plant is used for student and extension research projects. Companies will also hire the plant to test new ingredients they have produced.

The plant is also inspected to ensure all health codes and safety procedures are being followed. The Department of Agriculture makes a surprise visit monthly to inspect the plant, Adapa said.

Those interested in dairy processing can tour the plant in Call Hall. There are also classes available to learn about making and evaluating dairy products.

Cats bump No. 14 Texas A&M in 4

▪ After defeating the Aggies, the Cats go after Iowa State, Mizzou.

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

The K-State volleyball team got just what it needed this weekend. A win over No. 14 Texas A&M in four games.

It came at a timely moment for the Wildcats. It was senior night, and K-State said goodbye to senior play-set hitter Toie Young, senior swing hitter Kelli Luther and senior middle blocker Kate DeClerk.

The win ensured that the Wildcats will be participating in the NCAA Tournament and could possibly play host to a first-round game. The win also snapped a three-game losing streak.

"The biggest thing we had to do was take the emotion out of the game," Coach Jim Moore said. "It was hard because it was senior night, but it was something we needed to do to keep our concentration and not think about the last three losses."

Whatever the game plan was, it worked like a charm. The Cats jumped out to a 12-0 lead and smoked the Aggies in the first game, 15-1.

K-State got caught up in its victory and fell behind quick in the second game, 0-8. After a K-State sideout, Abbie Brown came to serve and helped earn the Cats four straight points, making the score 4-8.

The two schools traded points until the Aggies got to game point with a 7-14 lead.

The Cats then clawed their way back into the game, getting the score to 13-14. The Aggies and the Cats again traded points, and Texas A&M finally pulled out the game 16-14.

In the second game, Young, a four-year starter from Nebraska, etched her name in the record book as one of the elite volleyball players in K-State history. Young became the all-time K-State career-kills leader and finished the match with 1,348 kills, breaking the old mark of 1,337 set by Shawnee Call, who played from 1985-88.

After intermission, the Cats came out and put the final two games away, burying the Aggies 15-6, 15-3.

Junior setter Devon Ryning had 63 sets in the match. Sophomore swing hitter Kim Zschau had 24 kills, and Brown finished with 17 kills.

> VOLLEYBALL COACH

The three losses before Saturday night's game might turn out to be a blessing in disguise for the Cats. Had the Cats won two or more of the last four games, K-State could have earned a bye in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

"I've said all along that I'm not sure that a bye in the first round of the tournament would be the best thing for this team," Moore said. "We've never been this far before, and if we were to get a bye, that would mean that we would be playing a team that already had tournament experience.

"They would be over their first-game jitters, and we would be having ours. So now, we will be on the same level as who we might play in the first round of the tournament."

The Cats will play at Iowa State and at Missouri this at 7:30 p.m. Friday and Saturday to wrap up their regular-season schedule.

K-State beat both teams 3-0 in its first meetings Oct. 18-19. Iowa State and Missouri combined only have one win between them going into the games.

Snow: Old Man Winter's cold blessing

As I stood in a frostbitten state Saturday afternoon at KSU Stadium, the sight of frigid Wagner Field awoke several questions in my numb noggin: Why does the $1.25 cup of cocoa taste like hot water? Why am I surrounded by a pair of shirtless, pasty-chested guys? And most importantly, when will Old Man Winter open his pouch of arctic wonder and bless us with snow?

Yes, for many Kansas-dwelling individuals, winter means nothing more than cranking the thermostat and retreating to the confines of their home and/or transportational unit. But for those brave lads and lasses who view the closing of the year as one big dance party, snowfall is their Soul Train.

MY

Jon BALMER

Just think of all the wonderful and bedazzling sports that are possible due to the accumulation of water vapor. Leading the way is the age old tradition of sledding, the art of cheating death on a really thin, plastic object.

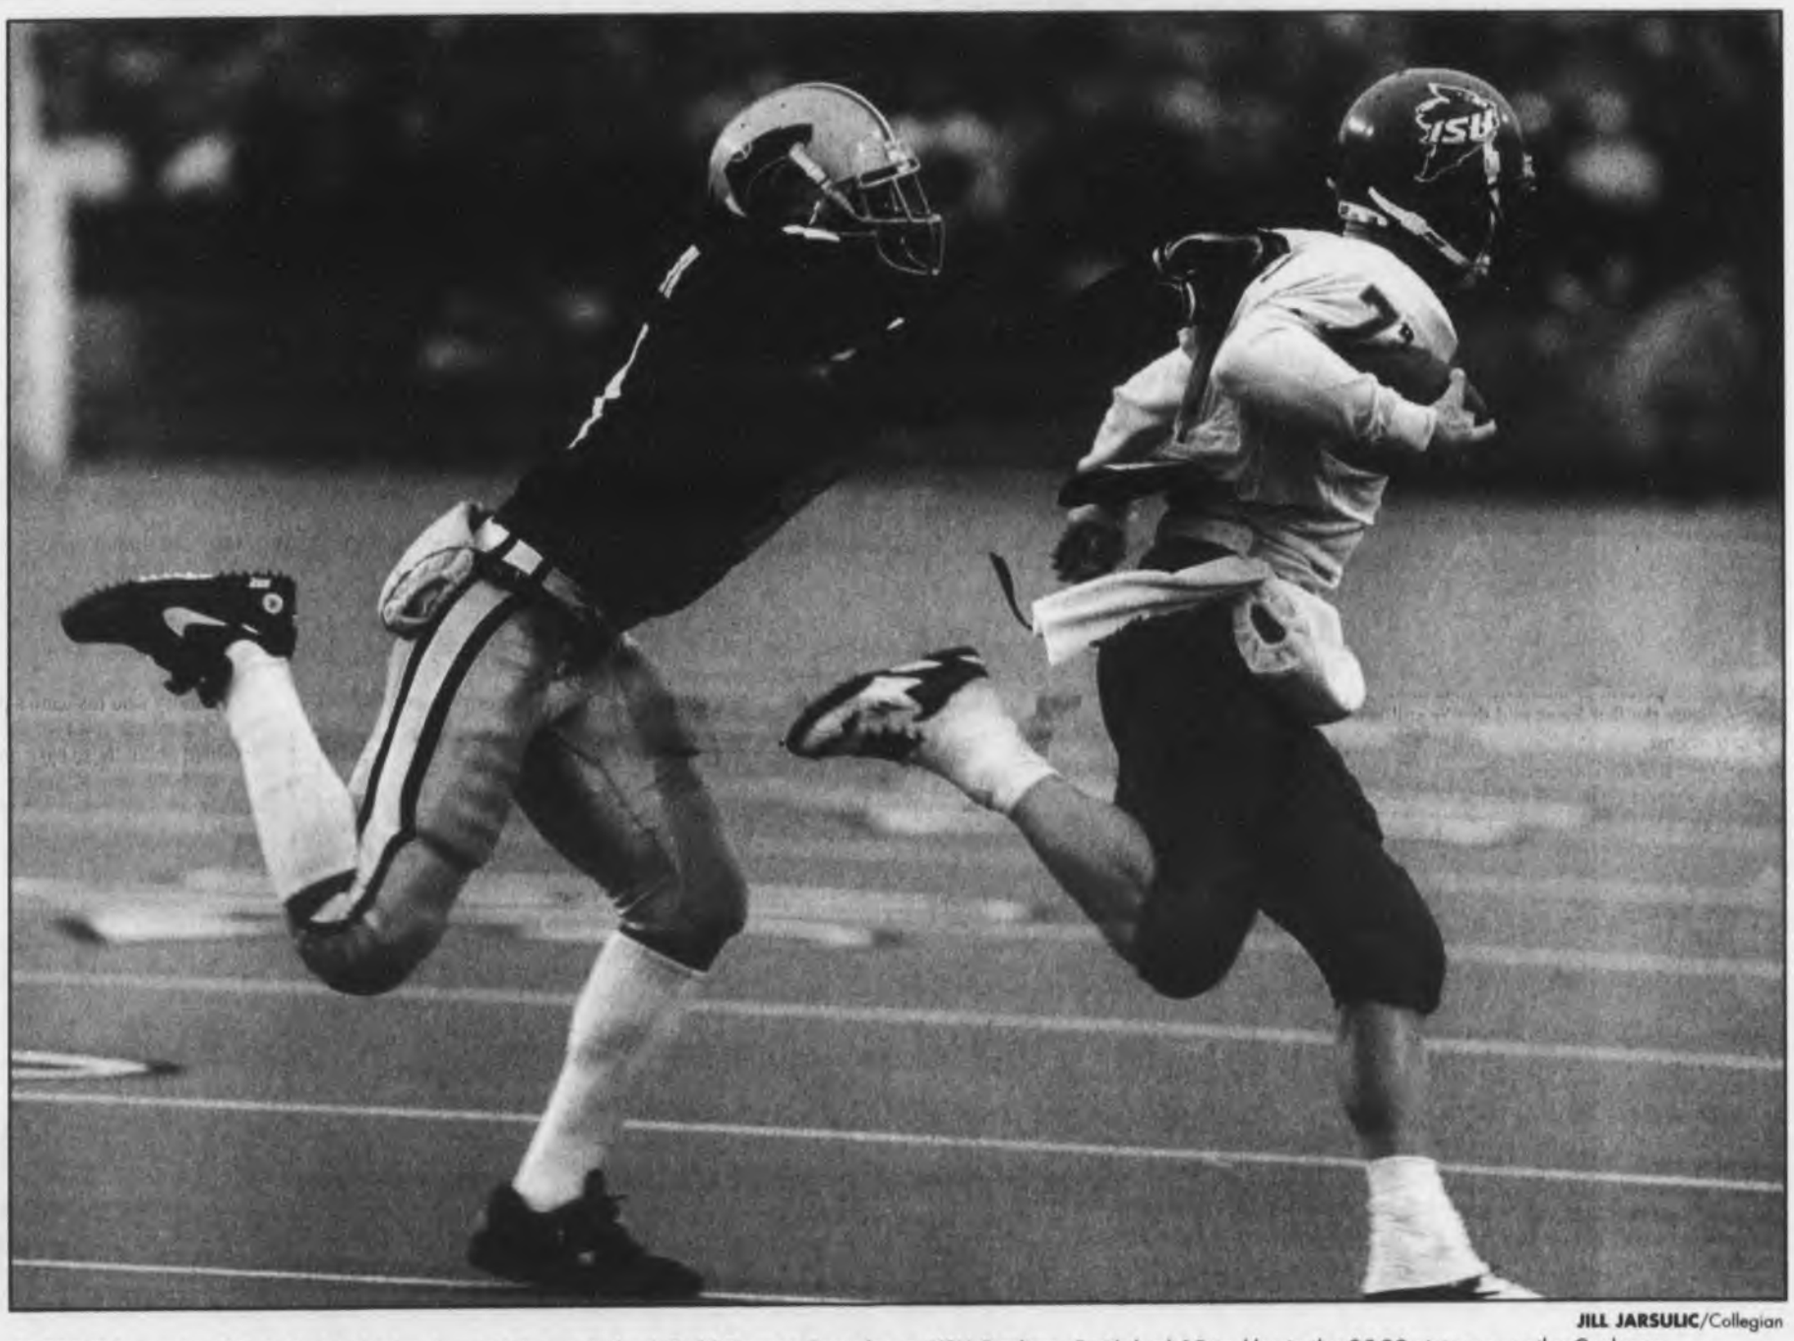
The weapons of choice for this arctic escapade range from toboggan to the more aerodynamically sculpted snow runners, but the real winter warrior tackles the slopes saucer-style. Just the adrenaline rush felt while cruising the hill at extreme speeds makes this simple circular fellow king of the sleds. Also, saucers provide the rider with a chance to be one with the Earth, which happens often after taking a bad bump and finding out firsthand what frozen grass tastes like.

While many are ready to let sledding fill their time on the tundra, others look to a more intense, grunt-filled sport to satisfy their winter cravings. I speak of ice football, that glorious ballet of testosterone fueled mayhem. Speaking as one of these cold lovin' cohorts, frozen fields provide the perfect setting for pigskin action, and also as a playground for the gridiron junkie's imagination. Where else can one picture himself as Bart Starr, John Elway (it hurts my stomach to even utter his name) or even William "The Refrigerator" Perry?

Also, the frozen terrain played on allows any participant the chance to step up and land in backyard football legend forever. Who knows, someday you may be sitting around telling your grandchildren about that cold and blustery day you picked off four passes and scored three touchdowns against the "high-powered" opponent led by your best friend.

Beyond these reasons, Ice Football also provides the element of bonding. Yes, once all the old buds have returned home for a week, where better to chat about the good old days than on the frozen dirt of a football field? And once your belly's been bombarded with turkey, that round leather ball just beckons for a match-up between the old school crew.

If at this point in the column you're saying "Enough with the football, buddy, lets talk snowball action," never fear, 'cause I'm ready to discuss the art of snowball fighting. This battle with the elements can range from friendly meeting to all-out warfare. But if a large scale showdown is goin' down, let me suggest a few tips on snowballs.



First off, if you have time before the fight, fill some snowballs with chunks of bananas or tasty Jell-O pudding. The pudding will require extreme concentration and sculpting, but there's nothing more satisfying than drenching a dude with tapioca.

Secondly, when designing your snow fortress, the above-mentioned saucer sled makes a handy shield as well. And once finished constructing the palace, a snow shovel can convert easily into a catapult. Just arrange it properly and pile on snow, and next thing you know your foe will be a snow gargoyle.

If you find yourself lacking in elements for weapon development (i.e. snow), there is one last solution. When battling at close range with your challengers, grab their snowsuits and deposit some icicles in their britches. Although a cheap and crude trick, it does allow you the time needed to run like heck back to your indoor hideout.

With all this discussion about the endless possibilities of snow, now all that remains is the element of waiting. Never fret, though, my fellow Cats, because this winter is predicted to be one of the coldest ever. And once the high heavens above open up and the white rain begins to fall, snow-powered madness will ensue.

K-State defeats Iowa State, 35-20; Lawrence outshines Davis in rushing

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

Running back Mike Lawrence became K-State's single-game rushing leader Saturday at KSU Stadium as the Wildcats trounced the Iowa State Cyclones 35-20.

"It's a great feeling coming out a winner," free safety Mario Smith said. "We maintained them and did a pretty good job on the offensive end."

K-State took possession two minutes into the contest at the Iowa State 32-yard line when Iowa State failed to convert on a fourth down.

Two plays later, Lawrence, who ran K-State's first nine plays on offense, scored on a 28-yard run.

Coach Bill Snyder said he was trying to mix things up on offense.

"We wanted to use the run in the game. We wanted to have some balance, but we didn't have as much as we wanted to," he said. "However, we don't vary our offense from week to week."

Iowa State's offense ate up the rest of the first quarter while only putting three points on the board.

In the second quarter, quarterback Brian Kavanagh threw for two touchdown passes while completing 12 of 13 passes.

"We passed a lot to keep them honest, and we had a balanced attack since we were running," Kavanagh said.

The Cat defense had to contend with rushing sensation Troy Davis, who broke the Iowa State all-time season record of 34 touchdowns Saturday.

"He is fantastic. It's a struggle to get him to the ground," Snyder said. "A lot of guys can find a crease, but I tell you he stays on his feet."

Davis finished the day with 225 yards on 48 carries but was overshadowed by Lawrence, who ran for 252 yards on 38 carries.

"Coach Snyder gave me a chance to do what he recruited me to do. I just went out and did my job," Lawrence said.

At halftime, K-State led 28-10 but struggled with its offense in the third quarter.

On the first series, the Cats were forced to punt for the first time in the game. On their next series, Kavanagh was sacked for a safety, which was the first safety given up by K-State since quarterback Chad May was sacked in the end zone in the 1994 Aloha Bowl.

K-State's only other score would come in the fourth quarter off another Lawrence touchdown. After that series, Iowa State used 10 minutes and scored when quarterback Todd Doxzon sneaked up the middle and notched the score at 35-20.

Iowa State recovered at the K-State 33-yard line on its kickoff when it successfully completed an onside, squib kick to the near side.

"I was livid about the onside," Snyder said. "That was unexcusable on our part."

However, the Cyclones could not take advantage of the kick and turned the ball over on downs after defensive end Nyle Wiren sacked Doxzon for 3-yard loss.

With that sack, Wiren recorded his 11.5 sack of the year,

Going into Saturday's contest at KSU Stadium, Iowa State's Troy Davis was receiving all the publicity. Would he or wouldn't he get 2,000 yards for the second-straight season? Davis rushed magnificently and got the mark against the K-State defense. But he wasn't the top ground-gainer on the field.

That honor went to Wildcat junior tailback Mike Lawrence.

MIKE LAWRENCE emerges from behind the offensive line and blocking of Toosavili "Tiny" Ulutu Saturday at KSU Stadium.

Lawrence rushed for a school-record 252 yards on 38 carries and three touchdowns, leading the Cats to a 35-20 victory over the Cyclones.

The previous school record belonged to J.J. Smith, who rushed for 227 yards in a season finale against Nevada-Las Vegas in 1994.

"I remember J.J. telling me that I would never get the record, I would never get it done," Lawrence said. "I'm going to give him a call tonight to tell him it's been done."

Lawrence got the Cats off to a quick score with 12 minutes and 14 seconds left in the first quarter. In the second play of the game for the Cats, Lawrence took the handoff and scampered 28 yards to put the Cats up 7-0.

On the Cyclones' next series, Davis started the series off by running the ball for 10 straight

Patterson nets first win; K-State topples Memphis

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Deb Patterson inherited a team with just 10 scholarship players. The team's four seniors had a 41-43 record and just one winning season to call their own.

Only one preseason exhibition was scheduled, and that against the best team international power Russia had to offer.

So when Memphis, a nationally-ranked opponent that thumped the Wildcats 72-57 last year, came calling, Patterson was forced to look for positives.

"The first great positive thing is we got a win," said Patterson. "And we got a win against an NCAA Tournament team."

K-State shocked the Lady Tigers 68-60 in front of 4,328 fans in the first of what might have been a season of upsets.

And the Cats didn't just win — they led from the opening tip to the final buzzer. K-State scored the game's first six points, including four of Andria Jones' game-high 23.

"One of the things we talked about going in was we needed to take responsibility for dictating tempo," Patterson said. "This is the kind of team that likes to dictate the game. They like to extend the floor and control your reactions.

"And we talked about the fact that we were going to come out aggressive, assertive and take control early. So I was real pleased when we were able to do that early."

By halftime the Cats led by 11, 35-24.

K-State extended the lead to 13 on a pair of free throws by Missy Decker. But Memphis, the nation's second-most potent offensive force last year, inched its way back to within two points, 57-55, with five minutes and 19 seconds remaining.

But Jones knocked down two more shots, and the Wildcat defense held the Lady Tigers to just five more points in the game.

"Our kids made real significant stops. And I think in the second half and throughout this game there were an enormous number of free throws shot. And it's hard to keep in a flow when you're constantly going to the line. I thought we kept good focus and concentration, and I thought we stepped up and made big stops when we had to," Patterson said.

Patterson said she felt her team shot very well from the floor and the victory was a great game all-around for the Cats.

"We stepped up and made some big shots when they made runs on us. We also missed some bunnies and some chips we should have made."

K-State stopped Memphis all day, holding the Lady Tigers to just 31.1 percent shooting. And the Cats hit 55 percent of their own shots in the second half despite the fact Jones said they're still learning a new offense.

"We're still working on it," she said. "That's nothing compared to what I think, and the team thinks we're capable of doing."

Jones proved she was capable of a double-double, adding 10 rebounds (and a team-high five assists) to her 23 points. Decker added 17 points and seven boards, and Brit Jacobson came off the bench to score 16.

"I like this game because we just beat an NCAA Tournament team. And that's what we aspire to be and to do and to achieve," Patterson said. "I think it should make a huge statement to the young women in this program that we have that capacity and we have that potential. This was a huge game in that respect."

Cats smash UMKC in season opener at Bramlage

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

In nine years, the K-State Wildcats had a perfect record of 11-0 against the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

K-State continued its streak Friday night at Bramlage Coliseum in front of a sizable Homecoming-enthused crowd.

The Cats, who feature a total of six players listed at or above 6'9", had the size advantage over the smaller Roos.

The Roos jumped out to an early 7-3 lead when K-State missed several consecutive short jump shots during the first five minutes of the game.

"We missed a lot of shots we should have made," Coach Tom Asbury said. "We make those shots, and it's an easier game."

The Cats overcame the four-point deficit and never looked back.

Senior center Gerald Eaker sparked a mini-run in the first half that put the Cats in front of the Roos by eight.

"I want to do what I can for this team," Eaker said. "I felt like I was doing a good job in the first half."

The Wildcat defense forced 14 turnovers in the first half from UMKC, which sparked the Cat offense.

"We were in a hole," UMKC coach Bob Sundvold said. "We didn't get back on defense, and they scored a lot of points on us, especially towards the end of the first half."

To close out the first half, K-State true freshman Pero Vasiljevic hit a three-pointer that fueled the Cats as they went into the locker room.

"I was real pleased with the poise of Pero," Asbury said. "He played an unbelievable super-hustle game and made a big play."

The Cats led 36-24 at halftime and took control of the ballgame as their intensity level increased during the latter part of the game.

"Our intensity was good, and we came out with the right attitude," Eaker said.

K-State's big men took charge in the second half as they out-rebounded the smaller UMKC team 26-17.

"It seemed like we got a bunch of points off of the boards, and it continued even toward the end of the game," forward Shawn Rhodes said.

Rhodes said he didn't mind coming off the bench but just wanted to be in the ballgame.

"I don't mind the bench. It's whatever Coach decides," he said. "It doesn't matter who starts, but who finishes makes the outcome."

Rhodes came off the bench to play almost 32 minutes and scored 13 points for the Cats and grabbed 10 rebounds.

"I liked seeing the double-doubles from our big guys," Asbury said. "They got us 27 offensive rebounds, and I was pleased with their efforts."

Asbury said his team's poor shooting wasn't a real concern to him.

"I attribute some of our poor shooting to their defense, but not all. I was disappointed about those easy missed shots, but we'll get better and better," he said.

With the win, K-State records its first win of the season and has its second contest of the season Tuesday when it clashes with the University of North Carolina-Asheville.

Willard host to new artists

▶ The bachelor's of fine art exhibition of Greg Rossignol and Jim Ginavan is in the Willard Gallery until Tuesday. Gallery hours are 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday. Call 532-6605 for more information.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

The Willard Gallery record for motorcycle art shows has been broken.

For the second time this semester — perhaps for the second time ever — an artist who draws inspiration from the motorcycle and its culture is exhibiting in Willard in a show that opened Wednesday.

Greg Rossignol's art takes cues from tattoo culture. His oil paintings are filled with castles and dragons, each fantastic symbol wrought in a cartoon style.

"I got fascinated with the tattoo subject matter," said Rossignol, senior in art with an emphasis in painting. "I just like weird stuff."

Rossignol said the fantastic imagery is inspired by his fascination with any subject matter regarding King Arthur.

Rossignol is working as a tattoo artist out of his home in Clay Center but plans to open a shop in Manhattan after graduating.

Rossignol said most of his work is usually in black and white, such as the drawings of motorcycles in this show. Working with tattoos and art inspired from them gives him a chance to use color.

The brightly bold use of color, with little to no shade or tint, reinforces the cartoon quality. The inclusion of a motorcycle in one of the paintings, "Gate Keeper," synthesizes his motorcycle drawings and his paintings.

The question remains, however, if Rossignol has successfully fused this low culture with high art.

Rossignol is also exhibiting much of his metal-smithing, which include goblets, rings and a beautifully wrought ornamental box.

Rossignol's works appear almost radical compared to Jim Ginavan's almost realist work.

Ginavan, senior in art with an emphasis in drawing, uses somber colors, static composition and hushed quality, which resemble Dean Mitchell's work in the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Where Mitchell's work accomplishes a finality, Ginavan's work has the quality of a study in the process of reaching the end product. Ginavan's work is less about telling a story or challenging perceptions than it is displaying technique, which, ironically, is an unjustified argument used against Mitchell.

"I think of all of it as being abstract," Ginavan said. "Although I seem to have a more realist approach to my work, I wouldn't consider it realist."

Ginavan said he draws most of his inspiration from his own experiences and emotions he has felt.

"I don't expect an emotional response from the viewer," he said. "I have a connection with all of these pieces."

The most abstracted work of the show, "Trains," a mixed media, evokes Ginavan's experiences traveling through Europe by train and his fascination with train stations.

"Trains" is a finely composed piece, incorporating details and geometric references culminating in the head-on approach of an antique train.

Ginavan, who is also graduating with a bachelor's of science in education, said he has attended K-State on and off since 1984, which also includes a stint in the military. He plans to seek employment as a secondary education art teacher.

There isn't much time to see this show. The Thanksgiving break, although a welcomed respite, interrupts the bachelor's of fine art exhibition schedule, cutting the show short Tuesday.

'Tommy' stuns audience

PORTIA SISCO
arts and entertainment editor

One of the premier rock operas of this century, "The Who's Tommy," stunned the audience with a stellar performance Friday night in McCain Auditorium.

"Tommy" was a fast-paced whirlwind of scenes. The story followed a young boy who witnessed the death of his mother's lover and was so emotionally scarred he turned himself off to the world.

The agility and the coordination of the cast made this a remarkable performance. In 30 minutes, the audience witnessed a whirlwind of scenes that brought Tommy from age 4 to adulthood.

Because Tommy could not break his solitude, the people his parents trusted to care for him took advantage of him.

Tommy suffered through a series of tragedies in which his inability to communicate made him helpless.

Only the audience was privy to Tommy's mind and could see that inside, he longed to be healed.

In one scene, Tommy was left alone with Uncle Ernie. Uncle Ernie was played by Paul Aguirre, a talented vocalist and actor. In his solo, "Fiddle About," Ernie made sexual advances toward Tommy, who was helpless to stop him.

Uncle Ernie was a bright spot of comedy in the production. Ernie landed on top, whether he was babysitting Tommy or trying to make a profit selling pictures of his nephew in the back streets.

In another scene, Tommy's cousin Kevin stuffed him in a trash can and kicked him across the stage. When Kevin babysat the 10-year-old Tommy, he discovered Tommy's amazing talent for pinball.

In one humorous, desperate attempt to heal Tommy, Tommy's father took him to the back streets to a prostitute. The adult Tommy was unaffected by the advances of the gypsy prostitute.

Played by Marie LaFerrara, the gypsy sang a raunchy song called "Acid Queen," filled with innuendo and broad, sexual gestures. Dancers dressed in colorful tights and lingerie swayed and gyrated around her as she pushed Tommy to the ground and pinioned him with her large, scantily clad body.

The cast wore colorful, bright costumes. Tommy always wore white as a symbol of his purity.

The set was surrounded by a red curtain. Inscribed on the curtain were the words "see me, feel me, touch me, heal me."

Scene changes took seconds as props and furniture flew across the stage. A table and couch were on rollers to allow them to be placed and removed quickly. The use of colored and strobe lights gave the production a rock-concert quality, probably inherited from the original production, performed by the Who.

A talented orchestra brought the performance to life with heart-stopping music which enhanced, but did not drown out, the powerful vocals of the cast.

The touring orchestra was small, but its music wasn't. The seven-man orchestra authentically reproduced the music written by Pete Townsend.

"Listening to You" was an emotional finale to the roller-coaster musical.

With a blunt, unabashed plot and stunning music, "Tommy" stirred the audience to a standing ovation.

Homecoming parade ends activities despite rain, cold

Sara Edwards
campus editor

The Homecoming parade and game Saturday concluded a week of chanting, bodybuilding and pomping.

Despite the steady drizzle, residence halls, greeks and other groups turned out for the annual event.

Mary VanLeeuwen, freshman in psychology and member of the Alpha of Clovia/Triangle team, said her favorite thing about Homecoming was the spirit everyone had.

"Everyone's just willing to jump right in there and get involved," she said.

The overall winners of the week were announced at halftime of the Iowa State football game. The Chi Omega/Pi Kappa Alpha team took first in the greek division, and Strong Complex took first in the residence-hall division.

Matthew Marron, junior undecided and Pike Homecoming chair, said there were four houses that were still battling it out for greek division title at the parade.

"It feels pretty good. It was really tough this year. It came down to the last event," Marron said.

John Schmoll, senior in history and president of Van Zile Hall, said participation made a big difference in Strong Complex's third-straight Homecoming victory.

He said that despite the fact the many people had tests and were busy Homecoming week, participation was five times what it was last year.

Kori Keeton, senior in political science and pre-law and Panhellenic Council president said the week was a success and that Paint it Purple added a lot to the Homecoming competition.

"I think it was an exciting week for everybody. It went off well," she said.

Strong Complex team, said she would compete next year.

"This is pure fun," Elliot said. "This was a great way to end a great week."

Homecoming for this year did have some changes.

In previous years, the Pant the Chant competition has been outside at KSU Stadium. But, because of the late scheduling of Homecoming, the event was moved inside. The change received positive support.

Nicole Johnson, sophomore in finance and member of the Kappa Kappa Gamma/Tau Kappa Epsilon/ Lambda Chi Alpha team, said the change in location for Pant the Chant improved the competition.

"It's awesome this year because it's here," Johnson said. "Better for the spirit of the students."

Heather Wagner, junior in elementary education and member of the Pi Beta Phi/Sigma Lambda Gamma/Alpha Tau Omega team, said the change was a great way to support the basketball team.

The change also brought people closer together, Wagner said.

Jill Ryan, junior in elementary education and member of the Alpha Xi Delta/Phi Gamma Delta/Delta Tau Delta team, said her team got really pumped for Pant the Chant.

"There will be a lot of cheering, stomping and clapping," Ryan said. "This is for spirit, the students' spirit."

straight plays. On the series, he ran the ball 15 times, setting up a field goal for the Cyclones.

But on K-State's following series, Law-rence was there to mirror Davis' performance. Lawrence started the series off by running for the first seven plays. On the eighth play, quarterback Brian Kavanagh hit Kevin Lockett for a 5-yard touchdown pass. The play was the first offensive play on the day that wasn't a run by Lawrence.

"We wanted to use the run in the game," Coach Bill Snyder said. "We wanted to establish the running game and create some balance. Mike played really well. He played the way he is capable of playing."

But a good day for a running back always has to start with the offensive line. All day the Cat offensive line played physical, opening up huge holes for Lawrence.

"It is really a thrill for the offensive line when a back has a big day like this," center Jason Johnson said. "It is great to be able to share this with Mike. It was really a team effort."

Involved in the team effort was the wide receiver, who continuously held the blocks down field for Lawrence.

On Lawrence's first touchdown, it was Lockett who sealed off the defender, allowing Lawrence to get into the end zone. "Everyone blocked very well today," Snyder said. "I was really impressed with the way our receivers blocked down the field today."

With that sack, Wiren recorded his 11.5 sack of the year, making him K-State's single-season sack leader.

With the win, the Cats improved to 9-2 on the year, their fourth consecutive nine-win season.

"It's the toughest 9-2 record I can recall. I am so tremendously proud of the team and the coaches and what they have endured," Snyder said. "Adversity has been monumental in my eyes, and what they have done to overcome that is fantastic."

K-State must now sit back and wait for a bowl invitation — one that might have the Cotton Bowl on it.

"This win gives us confidence going into a bowl game," Smith said. "We are definitely looking forward to a bowl game. If it is Cotton, it would be another high point for the KSU program."

Students looking to put a little glow in their hearts can also check with workers at the Manhattan Community Thanksgiving Dinner to see if any extra help is needed. Although they have enough volunteers as of now, they might need some on Thanksgiving Day.

After you're stuffed full of holiday food and good deeds, there are a few World Wide Web sites to be checked out to better your understanding of Thanksgiving.

An American Thanksgiving On The Internet (http://www.night.net/thanksgiving/) features information on the first Thanksgiving and squashes common stereotypes about the American tradition.

The site also has several links to other sites that feature traditional poems and songs as well as craft projects.

If you're looking to work off some of those holiday calories, check out Thanksgiving Turkey Hunt (http://users.intercomm.com/greg/turkey/index.html). This site puts you in a forest in pursuit of a turkey clad in pilgrim gear. If your hunt is successful, you'll receive a password that will enable you to add your name and Web site link to a list of other successful turkey nabbers.

World AIDS Day is coming to K-State a little late in the form of four panels from the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt.

The panels will be displayed in the K-State Student Union art gallery from Tuesday to Friday from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.

An opening ceremony is at 10:30 a.m. today. A closing ceremony at noon Friday will remember victims with a candle-lighting ceremony.

The closing ceremony will also include a presentation of new quilt panels.

"We are inviting people to bring panels to be presented for the national AIDS project quilt," said Don Fallon, committee chairman and K-State coordinator of religious activities.

There will be a panel made in memory of brothers Benjamin and Ronald Harris of Ogden, whose brother, Robert Harris, works at K-State.

The goal of the quilt and of World AIDS Day is to support AIDS patients and to remember victims and their loved ones while working toward a cure.

"We are doing this to create a greater awareness that this disease is in our community," Fallon said.

Fallon said one out of every 250 university students nationally contract HIV, and he said K-State probably meets this average.

K-State student dies in Australia

SCOTT PHILLIPS
staff reporter

Catherine E. Joyce, senior in civil engineering, died Saturday in an Australian hospital after an automobile accident Wednesday in Nambour, Queensland.

Joyce, 22, was attending the University of Southern Queensland under the supervision of the International Student Exchange Program.

Joyce was injured in an auto accident in which the driver and another passenger were killed. Joyce survived and was transferred to Royal Brisbane Hospital, where she died three days later.

"Right now, there are two scenarios to the accident," James Walawender, Joyce's boyfriend, said. "The news says that either a tire blew on the car and then hit a parked car, causing it to flip, or another car strayed into the other lane."

Joyce

At K-State, Joyce was active in the College of Engineering's concrete-canoe race, a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers and a Ford Hall representative. She was also a member of Phi Kappa Phi honor society, Chi Epsilon civil engineering honorary and the engineering honorary Tau Beta Pi.

Joyce was planning to return to K-State for the spring semester. After graduation, she was considering graduate school.

Joyce is survived by her parents, James and Sheila Joyce, a sister, Margaret, and two brothers, Patrick and Peter.

William Richter, associate provost for international programs, said memorial services are planned in Australia and in Maryland, Joyce's home state. Memorial services at K-State are pending.

A memorial fund is being established at the KSU Foundation by the office of international programs. For more information regarding the fund, contact that office at (913) 532-5990.

Any students who are interested in counseling services should contact University Counseling Services in Lafene Health Center at 532-6927.

Additional grief counseling and services are available by contacting Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities in the Office of Student Life at 532-6432.

K-State wins host spot in NCAA volleyball tourney

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

A few tense moments in the K-State volleyball offices Sunday night paid off with the announcement that the Wildcats would play host to California State University-Northridge in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

On a weekend when national powers Hawaii, Texas and Pacific were all upset, the Cats (25-8, 13-7 in Big 12 play) solidified their position by completing season sweeps of Missouri (15-10, 15-5, 15-7) and Iowa State (15-12, 15-2, 15-11).

So when the broadcast of the tournament pairings began, players and coaches alike anticipated the announcement K-State would make the 48-team field.

"I'd be lying if I didn't say I was relieved," Coach Jim Moore said. "You hear all the things like they're only going to take three teams from the Big 12. It's a relief.

"The big question was whether or not we were going to host."

But the Cats got their wish. K-State will be one of seven newcomers to the NCAA Tournament Wednesday when the Matadors of Cal State-Northridge (22-10), winners of the Big Sky Conference tournament, come calling.

Northridge will be making its third trip to the Tournament and has one National Invitational

Deaths not related to studying abroad

SCOTT PHILLIPS
staff reporter

Catherine E. Joyce, senior in civil engineering, is the second K-State student in less than two years to die while studying abroad.

In February 1995, Heather Stewart, junior in human development, died during a visit to Muros, Spain. She was struck as she was passing in front of a tour bus. At the time, Stewart, 20, was spending a semester at the University of Satiago De Compostela in Spain.

William Richter, associate provost for international programs, said he is concerned about the deaths, but he does not believe these accidental deaths were caused by the fact that these students were studying abroad.

Stewart

"Accidents can occur a block away or a half a world away," Richter said. "It is more difficult for the family and friends, though, when one is such a long distance from home."

Richter said he does not think these deaths will influence the number of K-State students interested in studying abroad.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at the Office of Student Life, said he believes it can be more difficult for friends and family to deal with a death when it's overseas.

"We always hate to hear when death occurs to a student," Fallon said. "When it happens overseas, students here at home have a hard time with closure.

"It's as if the death is unreal, or it really didn't happen."

Carla Jones, associate dean in the Office of Student Life, agreed.

"It is always sad to hear about losing someone," Jones said. "The fact is that when death occurs overseas, it is so much more complicated."

• MOTHER TERESA IN CRITICAL CONDITION. After feeling well enough to go home, Mother Teresa slipped back into critical condition Sunday, weakened by kidney and lung complications after a heart attack two weeks ago. The 86-year-old nun was conscious despite the abrupt deterioration in her health.

• NASA POSTPONES LAUNCH. NASA has delayed the launch of a spacecraft to Mars until Tuesday because of a cold front bringing strong wind, thick clouds and rain to Florida. The front was expected in the area by early today, when the Mars Pathfinder was supposed to lift off on an unmanned Delta rocket. Forecasters predicted a 95-percent chance of poor weather. Mission managers on Sunday rescheduled the launch for 2:03 a.m. Tuesday, when much better weather is expected. Pathfinder, which contains a lander and the first-ever Martian rover, is scheduled to arrive at the Red Planet on July 4, 1997. NASA's Global Surveyor spacecraft, launched Nov. 7, is en route to Mars.

• VOLCANO ERUPTS NEAR RWANDAN BORDER. A volcano erupted in eastern Zaire on Sunday, spewing a plume of ash and lava into the air about 30 miles from the border crossing at Goma, where Rwandan refugees are still straggling homeward. A lava flow down the northwestern slope of 10,022-foot Nyamulagira was six miles long by evening, but there was no indication of an immediate threat to the refugees. The U.N. refugee agency said it did not know whether any refugees would be affected by the eruption, but it is in the area of the Kahale and Kahindo camps.

• SERBS AGREE TO OSCE MONITORING OF ELECTIONS. Bosnian Serbs have agreed to let international monitors supervise municipal elections in their half of Bosnia. The vote is now planned for late June. Elections for local offices were initially to be Sept. 14, alongside national and regional elections. But the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a trans-Atlantic group supervising the vote, postponed them until late November and then again until June because of irregularities and security concerns.

• CATHEDRAL TO DEDICATE MONUMENT TO TWA VICTIMS. The largest cathedral in America will dedicate a memorial to victims of the TWA Flight 800 explosion, the nation's second-worst air disaster. The Cathedral of St. John the Divine will set the memorial into a wall in the 104-year-old cathedral, not far from a stained-glass window that commemorates the sinking of the Titanic. The dedication will take place on July 17, the first anniversary of the explosion off Long Island, the Very Rev. James Parks Morton said in his sermon Sunday. The monument will be engraved with the 230 names of those who died.

• DEADLY TWISTER HITS LOUISIANA. More than 100 old oak trees were strewn amid the wreckage of homes Sunday along the path of a tornado that ripped through town. Three people were killed. The storm Saturday night destroyed six homes and damaged 49, while overturning trucks on a nearby highway and blowing a wall off a factory. Tornadoes also skipped across parts of Mississippi, Alabama and the Florida panhandle, causing scattered damage and injuries. Emergency teams and volunteers helped this northern Louisiana community about 45 miles east of Shreveport clean up Sunday.

• SERBS RALLY AGAINST COMMUNISM. In the biggest rally ever against Serbia's authoritarian president, 150,000 people marched through the capital Saturday, hurling eggs and firecrackers at city hall and state TV offices. The rally began when about 15,000 students took to the streets in the 13th day of protests against Slobodan Milosevic, and it grew throughout the day. Students and other opposition supporters want Milosevic to recognize an opposition victory in area elections in Belgrade and other major Serbian cities. They also demand his resignation, saying the other Balkan countries have thrown out their Communist rulers and Milosevic's time has come.

Laura Bathurst, senior in anthropology and Spanish; Jason Cole, senior in political science and philosophy; Shanté Moore, senior in political science, Latin American studies and pre-law; and Erin Parkinson, a May 1996 graduate in political science will interview.

Finalists will be selected to interview Dec. 6 and 7 in Minneapolis. The scholarship pays for two years of study at Oxford University and is valued at $40,000-$60,000.

• PARENTS SUE SON OVER MURDER ALLEGATION. A Kansas couple sued their son for defamation Friday for his allegation that he recovered lost memories of his father raping and murdering an 8-year-old girl more than 30 years ago.

John and Sharon Massoni of Kismet, claim in the federal lawsuit that son Michael Massoni intentionally caused them severe emotional distress by the allegations and by reporting false accusations to police.

Michael Massoni confronted his parents in April after he allegedly remembered witnessing his father raping, sodomizing and dismembering the girl in Seward County, when he was five or six years old, said the parents' attorney, Daniel H. Diepenbrock, of Liberal.

PAIGE MCCARTHY, a 1987 K-State graduate, is still recovering from heart failure she experienced after the birth of her twins, Kelsey and Kylie McCarthy, in September.

Family recovery

Community helps to raise money for mother, twins after heart complications

A local K-State graduate and her twin babies are recovering after she experienced heart failure.

Paige McCarthy, a 1987 K-State graduate, gave birth to twin girls, Kelsey and Kylie McCarthy, Sept. 15 at Mercy Health Center. One week later, she had sudden heart failure due to the delivery.

In addition, Kelsey MCarthy was born with a heart defect.

Today, the entire family is improving and on its way to better health.

In support of the McCarthy family, many members of the Manhattan community sponsored a barbecue Oct. 13 for the family to raise funds for medical costs.

"I know that there were several volunteers who came out to help with the barbecue," Paige McCarthy said. "We are really thankful. I know that some students came out to volunteer and donate, and I think there were a few greek houses who came out, too."

Although the family is recovering today, the road hasn't always been so smooth.

At one point, Kelsey McCarthy was transferred to Stormont Vail Hospital in Topeka.

"Kelsey's heart is improving every time we go to the doctor," Paige McCarthy said. "We go to a cardiologist about once a month in Topeka."

Kylie McCarthy, who was born without complications, remained at Mercy Health Center.

Then, after Paige McCarthy had sudden heart failure, she was flown to St. Louis University Hospital in St. Louis.

On the flight to St. Louis, Paige McCarthy had a stroke after she had finally gotten her heart beating on its own, leaving her left side partially paralyzed.

On Sept. 23, she was scheduled for triple bypass surgery and was on the waiting list for a possible heart transplant. She did not end up having surgery, because her condition improved.

"I am doing a lot better," Paige McCarthy said. "My left-side weakness is improving considerably. Moving my fingers and raising my arms are getting better. It will just take some time.

"We are all just happy to be home."

Company to propose plans for law center

ANDREW FRANCIS
staff reporter

Riley County commissioners have asked a project-management company to submit a proposal for the design and construction of the law-enforcement center.

The request came after the company's presentation at the county commission meeting Nov. 25.

Jim Robertson and Dave Voorhis of Voorhis Robertson Justice Services Inc., a project-management company based in Longmont, Colo., presented a project outline to county commissioners.

For construction of the center, a project-management company will act as adviser to the commission and keep the construction process on schedule and on budget.

Project managers oversee all the daily operations of construction projects, working with the architect and the general contractor.

Voorhis Robertson said his goals for the law-enforcement center are to establish an appropriate budget and time schedule, to optimize the value of the center within the budget, generate maximum savings for the county and minimize disruption in the county government when occupancy of the center takes place.

"We're not here to dictate the police department's operations. We're here to make sure the process is followed and that we end up with a good result," Robertson said. "That's our responsibility."

Voorhis Robertson has overseen the construction of four civic-justice centers nationwide and has served as consultant for more than 500 other projects, Robertson said.

The commission hired Voorhis Robertson to help get the law-enforcement center proposal on the November ballot.

Getting the center on the November ballot and passed the first of three phases.

Voorhis Robertson was contracted to facilitate the process of assessing the county's need for a new law-enforcement center and to outline concepts of constructing the center.

Voorhis Robertson's services cost $93,000. The company's fees were included in the overall law-enforcement center budget of $10.8 million.

Voorhis Robertson's proposal is expected to be submitted to the commission in early January.

County Commissioner Karen McCulloh said if the Voorhis Robertson proposal is reasonable and flexible, there should be no reason to reject it.

If the project-management company's proposal is accepted, the law-enforcement center project will be launched into the second phase, which will include deciding which architects and general contractors will be involved in the project.

"I think we have to feel pretty good about where we're at right today. I think we're in control of our destiny," Russ Frey, county commission chairman, said.

Lost, damaged ID cards replaced in Union

MATT SPURGIN
staff reporter

You lost your ID card. It won't scan. Maybe it got bent in your pocket and is falling apart. Anyway, you are going to have to get that card replaced. More than likely, you will have to pay the $10 replacement fee to get a new card.

The ID center in the K-State Student Union replaces ID cards for students who have lost their cards, damaged their cards or have cards that just won't scan.

Rhonda Ayre-McCabe, Validine clerk at the campus card center, said cards that show no physical damage can be replaced at no charge. Students with damaged cards or lost cards have to pay to get their cards replaced.

Ayre-McCabe said they will make exceptions in some cases. For example, those might make an exception if students live in the residence halls or go to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex a lot, and their cards get used frequently.

"If it is wear from usage, we will replace it at no cost," Ayre-McCabe said.

If the card has nothing physically wrong with it and is just flawed, it will be replaced at no charge, she said.

Ayre-McCabe said when students come in with cards that will not scan, they will first try to reheat and re-encode the magnetic strip. The magnetic strips can't be replaced, so if this doesn't work, the entire card must be replaced.

If the card is damaged, the student will have to pay a $10 fee to get a new card.

Jack Thoman, assistant director of business affairs at the Union, said some of this fee goes to cover the costs of materials for the cards.

Thoman said some of this covers the cost of the first card that students get because there is no charge for the first ID card. He said he doesn't have figures as to how much revenue replacement cards generate.

"We haven't had it under our belt prior to this," he said.

The Union took over operation of the ID card center after finals last May.

Thoman said the move was made to save hassles with the cards because the Union operates the Wildcat Card account.

"It centralizes a bit the running around that some people had to do," he said.

Thoman said excess revenue created from replacement cards would probably go to the Union, but he also said the Union is looking at a new card system with digitalized photos.

IN OUR OPINION

Now is the time to reflect on how AIDS affects us all

You might have noticed the heavy coverage of World AIDS Day, the AIDS quilt and AIDS Awareness week in today's issue of the Collegian.

You might be sick and tired of hearing it by now.

You might think this is the last thing the editorial board needs to write about considering the wide coverage in the news sections of the paper.

WHY WE CARE

AIDS and HIV are here, and every one of us is vulnerable to the disease. The only way to protect yourself is to educate yourself.

But reading about it is one thing. Absorbing the information and accepting your vulnerability to the disease is quite another.

AIDS is here. It's in Manhattan. It's at K-State. It's in Aggieville.

One in every 250 Americans has HIV. That means one person in a General Psychology lecture class has AIDS or HIV.

AIDS is deadly.

You're not immune.

But don't live in so much fear that you isolate yourself.

Learn about it. Learn how you can contract it. Learn how to protect yourself from it. Learn about those who live with it — and those who die from it.

One way to educate yourself is to attend some of the panels, lectures and discussions that accompany the week.

Go see the AIDS quilt in the K-State Student Union. It is the first time it has come to Manhattan.

And don't just look at it and say "Neat. Cool design." Look at it. See what it represents.

Reflect upon your own life in relation to AIDS.

We are all affected by AIDS and HIV. Many of us know those who have lived with and died of the disease. Many of us have gone through a week of stress and torment of getting an HIV test.

AIDS is here.

We can choose to ignore the risk and die from ignorance, or we can educate ourselves and others.

In Our Opinion, an editorial discussed and chosen by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board. For information on who is an editorial board member or how you can become a member, contact Sera Tank at (karolyi@ksu.edu).

This is the true story of five people picked to live together and share their cultures and personalities to see what happens when people stop being polite and start getting real

The Real World

MY VIEW

Roopa SWAMINATHAN

Different people.

Different countries.

Different sexes.

Different cultures and ideas.

But we are often told we have everything going for us.

Our response to that?

We want more.

Three Americans, one Japanese guy and myself (an Indian) live together, and somewhere down the line, we practice multiculturalism in a small way ourselves.

Different in every way possible, the one thing we do have in common is our commitment to make something of our lives.

Akinori is the veritable baby of the house. At 20, he is the youngest. He came to the United States from Japan after learning English in two years. He dreams, breathes and lives food. He also cooks most of the time. No small wonder, he wants to open his own restaurant someday.

Michelle? We are lucky if ever we get to see her. A total powerhouse, her energy level astounds us. She goes to school full time, is president of the business fraternity, works in the mall and is in and out of the house before you can say hello.

Oh, yeah. When she has the time, she takes a breath.

Then there is Hal, the most laid-back of us all. Nothing quite excites him. Unless, of course, it is body piercings. He is pierced in most places — some mentionable and others unmentionable — and we attribute it all to his being artistic. Taking artistry to new dimensions, he has installed a decorative water fountain and a lifelike nude statue of a woman in chains — his own Alice, in his room.

Among other things.

He reads Madonna's "Sex" and then expounds on the status of women and morality. Very convincingly, too.

Just when you think he is the most dispassionate of us all, he cries talking about his cat. And when you dismiss him as being uncommitted, he spoils it by being one among 32 students chosen from all over the world by the American Management Association for a 10-day seminar for Operation Enterprise. That too on a scholarship.

Each day is a new day.

A tired and totally worn-out Michelle comes home at midnight after a hard day's work — and almost immediately, she and Aki toddle off for a midnight jog. And create a din when they return and wake Clint up.

Aaah, Clint. He is considered the most polite and nicest of us all. Deluded souls, all of them. He is, in fact, the most volatile of the whole lot. He throws a fit at the drop of a hat, is angry about most things in life and voices his objections, too. Rather loudly.

But he is also ambitious and a total go-getter.

At a time when advertising agencies in California wondered if good ol' Kansas in the deep Midwest yonder had any colleges offering advertising at all, he managed to secure an internship at the very prestigious Ogilvy and Mather in Los Angeles this summer.

Throwing in his own two bits for culturalism, he plans to go to Asia sometime and start his own business in Japan or China.

And then there is me.

My roommates find everything about me funny. Michelle wonders if I am quite there each time I drink tea with milk and sugar. All of them wonder how my life is complete when I don't eat meat.

Living with others requires a lot of understanding and compromising.

It is not easy. But somehow, we all make the effort. That little extra effort.

It is exciting too, even as we discover new worlds and new cultures.

And so far, touch wood, it has worked.

Of course, we have our own problems.

Each time we are in the midst of a soul-searching discussion on the figure of Jenny McCarthy, my roommates crack jokes about Indians worshiping cows. Very soon, I plan to crack some jaws. I make those threats regularly, and that itself is a joke in the house.

Then, there are times when we share a few drinks, sit around our fireplace and watch television or simply talk.

Every now and then, my vegetarian mind screams first-degree murder when Aki and Hal eat sushi.

I, for one, don't understand any of Hal's or Clint's music at all. First, I thought it was the culture thing.

Then, being the oldest, I thought it was the age thing until I realized Michelle and Aki felt the same. Thank God.

All three of us now make a genuine effort to appreciate the noise Clint and Hal painfully stress is music even as we pray for divine intervention and soak our sorrows in collective misery.

Roommates.

We eat, drink, talk, fight, argue and sulk all the time. Many times, we tell ourselves it was the biggest mistake to live together.

But we also party, bitch, cry on one another's shoulders, make plans for the future and promise to keep in touch, and when we get disgustingly sappy, we actually promise to attend each other's weddings.

And count our blessings that we found each other and live together.

So cohesively.

We began as roommates.

We have become friends.

the test

Getting tested for HIV means living through 10-14 days of pure hell and living with the results

MY

Mary Renee SMITH

So someone at the clinic calls my apartment and says she would like me to go in.

After being awkwardly shuffled through the front office, I sit nervously on the paper at the end of the exam table and wait.

What seems like a few years later, the doctor comes in. He seems a little uneasy. I figure I'm just paranoid.

We exchange pleasantries. He tells me I'm HIV-positive.

He doesn't say "How's the weather, you tested positive," but it seems that way. I really don't hear anything after the word HIV, and I don't remember anything he said before.

I just sit there, numb from head to toe.

Oh my God, now what?

Who did this to me? I'll find him. I'll cut it off. I'll ... that won't do any good now. I should have thought about that before.

Oh God, who I have given this to? How long have I been infected and not known? Why didn't I get tested before?

This has to be a mistake. Some kind of sadistic mix-up at the lab. I can't have AIDS. I don't have AIDS, yet. I have the virus that causes AIDS. Big deal, same difference. I'm going to die.

Oh well, I'm going to die anyway. I could get hit by a bus tomorrow. I could get a brain tumor five years from now. That's not any different.

Hell, yes it is.

I'll live the rest of my life in fear of catching the common cold or getting a small cut that might get infected.

I'll never see my boys graduate from high school. I'll never see my sister get married. I'll never see my grandchildren. I'll never have sex again. I'll never have any more children.

The "I'll-nevers" never end.

Wait, people with HIV and AIDS are living longer now. There are new medications and medical breakthroughs every day.

Maybe I will live for a few more years — possibly decades. Great tens of years, taking tons of different drugs, vitamins, herbal teas and experimental treatments.

I've played this terrifying scenario over and over again in my head.

I've wondered how I would respond and what I would do.

Would I tell my parents? Would I drop out of school? Would I spend more time with my children? Would I commit suicide?

But for now those question are all hypothetical.

I don't really know if I'm HIV-positive.

I went and got tested this morning.

I took my last $20 out of the bank, went to the Riley County-Manhattan Health Department, rolled up my left sleeve and got tested.

I'll know in 10-14 days. For two weeks, all I can do is wonder.

I don't really think I am positive.

I've been careful. I don't think I've ever been in contact with someone who has HIV or AIDS. I know everyone I've exchanged bodily fluids with.

I've never had any sexually transmitted diseases.

Still, I have to wonder. I haven't always been as careful as I could have been.

Abstinence is the only perfect protection. Condoms aren't foolproof. I know a few very surprised parents who can tell you about those little holes in condoms.

And I have been sick a lot lately. I've got these little sores in my mouth. I'm tired. I've been having a hard time remembering things.

This test is turning me into a hypochondriac.

> "I'm scared. But I am doing something with my fear. I'm rethinking how I live my life. I'm going to do what I can to stop the spread of AIDS. Education is our No. 1 weapon. Ignorance will kill us all."

I'm scared. But I am doing something with my fear. I'm rethinking how I live my life. I'm going to do what I can to stop the spread of AIDS.

Education is our No. 1 weapon. Ignorance will kill us all.

I'm going to do all I can to be sure no one who has ever died of AIDS is forgotten.

A few panels from the AIDS quilt will be on display in the art gallery in the K-State Student Union for a week beginning today.

Each panel is specially made for a person who has died from complications resulting from AIDS. Take a few moments this week to stop by and take a look.

One day, I might have a panel. One day, you or someone you love will have a panel.

I hope someday the quilt will be a memorial to the lives lost to a long-since stopped plague.

Cats improve to 3-0 with win

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

The K-State men's basketball team improved to 3-0 on the season as it cruised to an 85-66 victory over the Morgan State Bears on Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum.

Leading 9-3 in the first quarter, the Wildcats went into their man-to-man defense to try to protect their lead against the much smaller Morgan State team.

"If it would have been a conference game, we would have gone to a zone much earlier, but we need to keep confidence in our man," Coach Tom Asbury said. "We obviously had the size advantage, and we needed to stay big."

The Cats' defense forced 12 turnovers on the Bears in the first half, but that didn't completely stop their offensive production.

Morgan State's suffering full-court pressure defense put the Cats in a bind halfway into the contest. K-State saw its once-comfortable lead diminish to a five-point deficit with 8:29 left in the first half.

Guard Aaron Swartzendruber put a fire into the K-State offense as the Cats went on a 13-2 run in the next three minutes and 30 seconds.

Asbury credited Swartzendruber with providing the team a spark in the first half.

"Swartzendruber has to be given a lot of credit," Asbury said. "Aaron is a classic blue-collar overachiever. He's made himself into a very confident player, and he was terrific."

K-State led 37-32 at halftime but did struggle with a few things in the first period, especially rebounding.

"I was upset at halftime," Asbury said. "When this team only has one offensive rebound at half there's a problem. We're young and dumb, but we are athletic."

Asbury said Morgan State simply outplayed the Cats in the first half.

"We didn't match their intensity level in the first half," he said.

Asbury's remarks at halftime put new life into the team as it came out for the second frame.

"I got mad at myself," center Gerald Eaker said. "I said this is our team, we gotta win, and I didn't want to lose this game."

Well, maybe he should get mad more often.

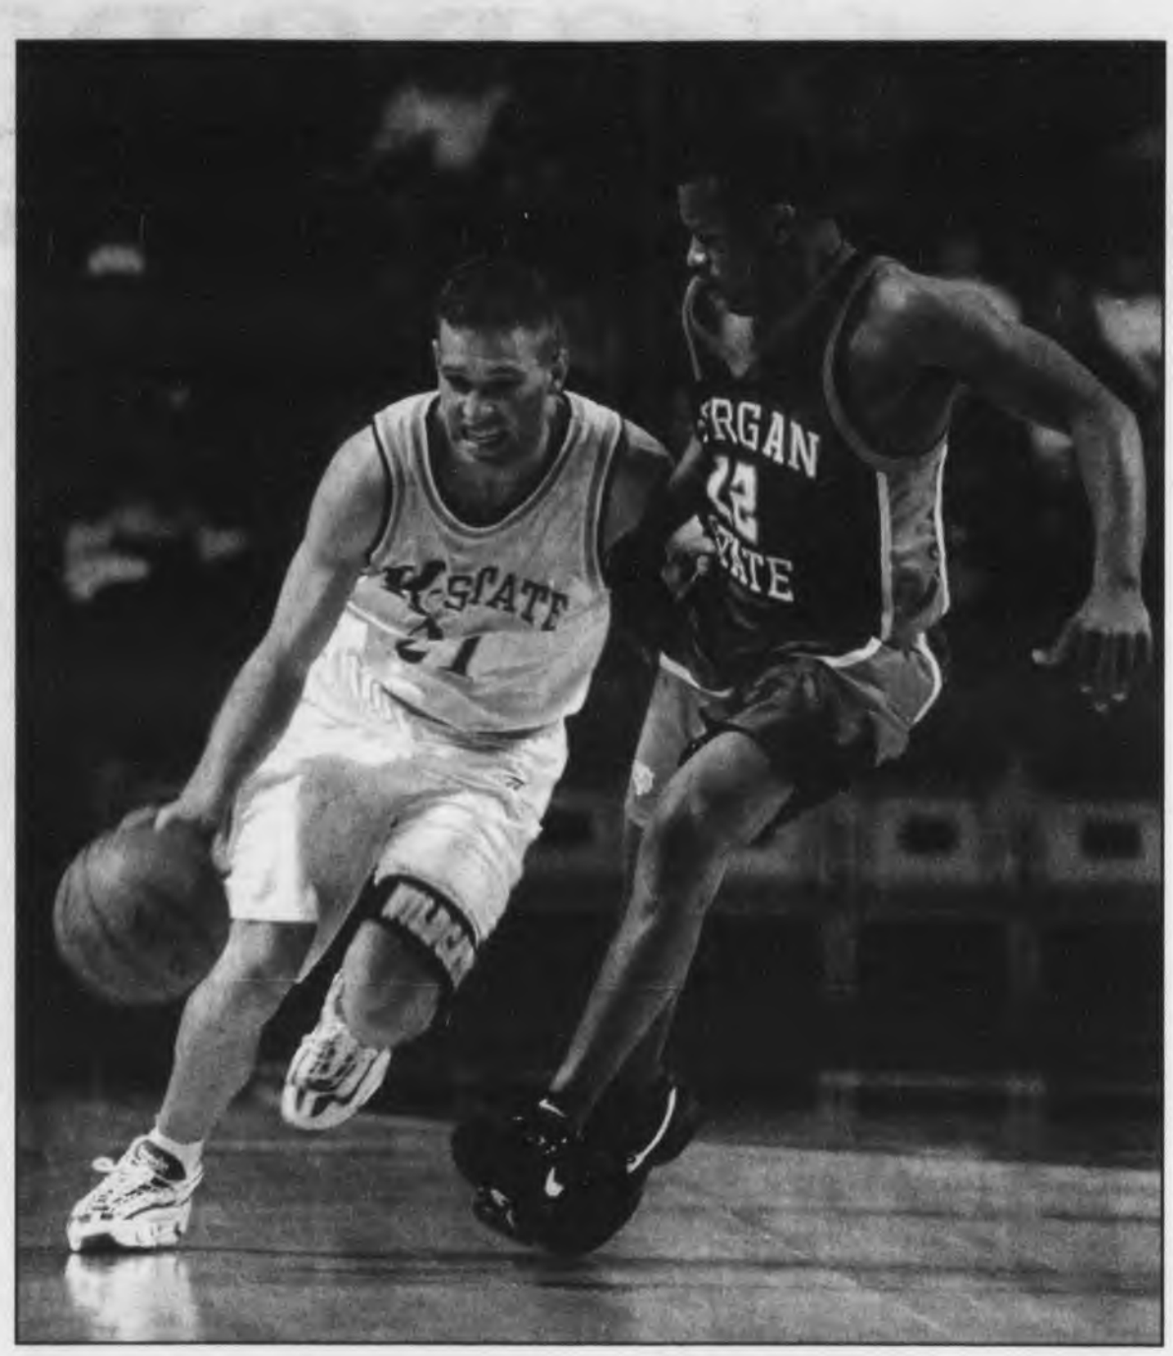
Eaker reeled off 19 points in the second period, including a spurt where he made nine field goals in a row.

"If you bring yourself down to the level of your opponents, you don't play well," Eaker said. "I had to go out in the second half and play like I knew I could."

Eaker's 90-percent field-goal shooting set a Bramlage record, and the Bears could do nothing to stop his streak.

"Eaker killed us in the second half, and we didn't have an answer for him," Morgan State coach Chris Fuller said. "I'm sorry they gave him the ball. I regret that because that was the difference and we couldn't stop him."

Eaker wasn't the only player Morgan State couldn't stop. Forward Mark Young exploded for 13 in the second half, igniting the crowd with his electrifying dunks.



"Mark has matured as a player," Asbury said. "They have confidence in Mark initiating the offense, because he makes smart plays."

All in all it was K-State's transition game that factored in the contest.

"We just tried to play aggressive defense," Young said. "That makes our offense stay clicking."

The offense clicked clear up until the final buzzer as K-State won 85-66.

Both Eaker and Young recorded career highs both in total points and field goals. Eaker finished with 22 points on nine field goals, while Young finished with 21 points on nine field goals.

Eaker has career day against Morgan State

SHANE MCCORMICK
staff writer

It was a tale of two periods for K-State center Gerald Eaker on Saturday against the Morgan State Bears.

Eaker hit one shot from the field and scored just three points in the first half. But in the second, Eaker scored 19 points, leading the Wildcats to a 85-66 victory over the Bears at Bramlage Coliseum.

Eaker finished the game, hitting 10-11 shots for 22 points, both career highs for the senior. His .909 field-goal percentage was a Bramlage Coliseum record.

But by the end of the first half, Eaker hadn't grabbed a single offensive rebound. The team as a whole had grabbed just one against a Bear team whose tallest starter is just 6'7".

"With our size, that cannot happen. That was the big thing in the first half," Coach Tom Asbury said.

So did Asbury have a few words to say to his senior center at halftime?

"Oh, yeah, he was pretty angry," Eaker said. "And I got a little mad at myself. I knew I had to do whatever to help my team out in the second half."

After missing his first shot in the second half, Eaker hit his next nine. At the 13:33 mark of the second half, Bear guard Tremain Byrd scored on a layup to cut the Cat lead to 52-49.

But Eaker responded with a three-point scoring play and a put-back on the next possession. The baskets stretched the Cat lead to eight.

"Eaker just killed us in the second half," Bear coach Chris Fuller said. "We just couldn't find an answer for him today."

Eaker didn't touch the ball much in the first half, attempting just one shot. But Asbury said that could be attributed to his effort.

"He wasn't matching their energy level in the first half," Asbury said. "He Cats fare well in tournament

STORY BY DAN LEWERENZ

With the holidays fast approaching, K-State (4-0) wrapped up two more victories last weekend, defeating Nichols State and Grambling State in the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic.

But despite playing in the friendly confines of Bramlage Coliseum, the Wildcats found themselves in unfamiliar territory — behind. After leading both Memphis and Bradley from tip to finish, K-State trailed first-round opponent Nichols State by three points after giving up a 9-0 run in the first half.

But if fans thought they were watching a different team than the one that handled Memphis a week earlier, they were.

Starting guard Sara Munson, who did not play at Bradley because of pain in her left leg, will be out four to six weeks with stress fractures in her left femur, and Coach Deb Patterson used the Nichols State game to explore new lineups.

"I felt like this was a game where, because of the loss of Sara Munson, we had to look at some different things," said Patterson, who tried Jenny Coalson at the off-guard spot and Andria Jones and Kayla Hester at the small-forward.

The Wildcats went into halftime with a slim 26-23 lead.

But the second half belonged to K-State. The Cats outscored the Lady Colonels 38-21 in the second period, paced by 11 second-half points each from Jones and Brit Jacobson.

Even more important, the Cats pulled out a win without a single second-half shot from Missy Decker, the team's third-leading scorer.

"I was just trying to get the ball up the floor," Decker said. "It was pretty chaotic in the first half, and I wanted to keep control of the game."

> Those were big shots. And with the way this Grambling team plays, you get the sense they're never out of the game.
> Deb Patterson, coach

Decker and her teammates succeeded, committing just 11 turnovers, after committing more than 20 in each of their first two games.

Jones led K-State with 21 points on 10-of-14 shooting and 13 rebounds, committing no turnovers. Jacobson added 15 points.

Grambling State positioned itself for a championship contest with the Cats by defeating Marquette 62-61 in the first round. The Lady Tigers forced Marquette into 36 turnovers, 23 of them on Grambling State steals.

The championship saw another back-and-forth first half, with seven lead-changes and three ties before K-State claimed a 39-36 halftime lead.

But Jacobson exploded in the second half, firing off 12 straight points, including two three-pointers, to give the Cats a 16-point lead with 12:26 to play.

"Those were big shots," Patterson said. "And with the way this Grambling team plays, you get the sense they're never out of a game. When she stepped up and knocked down those shots, it was big."

The Lady Tigers (1-3) never recovered from that run, coming no closer than six points before the Cats closed out a 72-62 victory.

"I told them before this game that playing the Grambling State team was going to be a lot like playing Big 12 teams," Patterson said. "They're aggressive. They're physical like what we'll see in the conference."

Jacobson led the Cats with 31 points, including four of eight from behind the arc. Jones added 16 points, and Hester had a team-high six rebounds.

In the consolation game, Marquette (2-3) held on to defeat Nichols State 76-60.

Jacobson catalyst for basketball team's opportunity-seeking transformation

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

K-State's women's basketball team is going through a transformation.

The offense has changed from a loose motion offense designed to create opportunities to a controlled triple-spot designed to create shots. The defense has changed from an aggressive, in-your-face man-to-man to a looser man mixed with zone coverage.

And more than anyone else, that change is personified in Brit Jacobson.

The junior guard was K-State's top returning scorer as both a sophomore and a junior. But only now is she emerging as the premier player Wildcat fans expected when she became the first-ever Kodak All-American to sign with K-State out of high school.

Jacobson has moved from small forward to off-guard, and under the tutelage of associate head coach Kamie Ethridge, she has developed into one of the Big 12's most potent offensive threats — something opponents found out for themselves in the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic, where Jacobson earned Most Valuable Player honors for unloading 31 points on Grambling State in the championship and 15 points on Nichols State in the first round.

"I think what Kamie has brought to Brit's game is an understanding of the game," Coach Deb Patterson said. "And I mean that in every respect — good-shot, bad-shot, one-on-one moves, reads, defensively. It's just a total package of knowledge.

"And I think she's done a great job of absorbing a lot and trying to put it into a very athletic, aggressive body."

In fact, that athleticism might have been both Jacobson's greatest strength and her greatest weakness in previous campaigns. At 5'7", Jacobson is shorter than most of her opponents. But perhaps no player in the Big 12 — and few in the country — can match her strength, speed, quickness and leaping ability.

But Jacobson relied on that athleticism, rarely spotting up for shots. Instead, she would drive past her defender, often into a crowd, where she would use her vertical to shoot over opponents.

And while that's still an option, it's no longer the only option.

"They've really changed my game for me," Jacobson said. "I'm not looking to penetrate every time. I'm working within the offense, and seeing more and more how it can work for me."

One thing it's done is make Jacobson a legitimate three-point threat. Jacobson hit just 10 of 63 attempts (26.3 percent) from behind the arc in her first two seasons. This year she's already 10 for 23 (43.5 percent).

"That makes her deadly," Patterson said. "She's got as much quickness in terms of getting to the basket of any player in the league, hands down. And once you have to defend her as a three-point shooter and extend, it opens up the ability for her to penetrate.

"And now that she has the knowledge and understanding of how to get to the basket when she's guarded tight and when to get to the basket if she's guarded tight, it makes her a great threat."

BRIT JACOBSON has the ball knocked from her grip by Grambling's Frederica Wills Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum. To discourage Grambling's full-court press, K-State spread its offense and lobbed long balls to Jacobson.

Bowl appearance creates benefits for K-State students, University

MISSY SNODGRASS
staff reporter

K-State fans, are you ready? The Wildcats are going bowling.

K-State's football team will be going bowling again this year, and the University will be reaping the benefits.

"I think the big thing is the visibility it brings to the institution. The bowl game helps with alumni relations. It rekindles the sparks of loyalty. It makes visible other aspects of the University and attracts new students and potential benefactors," athletic director Max Urick said.

Financial rewards also play an important part in the postseason game. However, there is a misunderstanding about bowl-game payouts.

"The biggest misconception on the part of the public at large is if you go to a bowl game, your money problems are solved," said Bob Cavello, assistant athletic director for business operations.

The payouts vary for each bowl, but a NCAA rule requires a minimum payout per team be at least $750,000.

"The Aloha and Copper bowls pay this amount. On those two games, we didn't make any money," Cavello said.

The Big 12 Conference allows the University to keep the first $1 million of the bowl payout, unless the University goes to an Alliance Bowl, allowing them to keep $1.5 million. The rest of the money goes into a pool that is divided between the other schools in the conference, Urick said.

> The biggest misconception on the part of the public at large is if you go to a bowl game, your money problems are solved.
> • BOB CAVELLO
> ASSISTANT ATHLETIC DIRECTOR FOR BUSINESS OPERATIONS

This will work out to be about $633,000 per member institution in the conference after it is divided up, Urick said.

With the first $1 million, the University pays for the expenses created by going to the bowl. It pays for hotels, training facilities, transportation, food and any other additional expenses.

"One million dollars is a lot of money, but we have to relocate a team of over 100 players and the sports staff for 11 days. We are forced to to use the bowl committee's facilities and hotels and pay super-premium prices. One million dollars doesn't go very far," Cavello said.

For example, the Holiday Bowl pays about $1.4 million. K-State kept the first $1 million for expenses and gave $400,000 to the conference. After expenses, the University had about $32,000 left.

"Any amount that they do not spend is retained by the individual school, and it goes into a student scholarship program," Urick said.

The revenue-sharing formula helps all the universities in the conference.

"We heavily rely on the conference. Without the conference, we would cease to exist as a viable athletic program. We benefit from the success of the conference," Cavello said.

Aside from the financial aspects, K-State will enjoy other benefits.

"The purpose of the bowls is to award the team that has distinguished itself from its peers. Starting from there, it has benefits derived by the University, including the potential for financial gain and visibility to promote the school and different programs," Urick said.

Green Bay pounds Chicago 28-17 to create 14th-win home legacy

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GREEN BAY, Wis. — Antonio Freeman made up for his missed month in a hurry.

Freeman returned to Green Bay's lineup after missing four games with a broken left arm Sunday and set career highs with 10 receptions for 156 yards in the Packers' 28-17 victory over the Chicago Bears.

The Packers (10-3) beat Chicago (5-8) for the sixth straight time and won for the 14th straight time at Lambeau Field. The Packers still have never lost a December game in Green Bay during coach Mike Holmgren's five seasons and the Bears remained winless on the road since in the regular season since 1987.

Despite playing with a cumbersome cast, Freeman provided Brett Favre with the deep threat he sorely missed in November. He fumbled after his first catch but he had five catches for 101 yards by halftime.

The second-year wideout from Virginia Tech broke his previous career bests of seven catches for 146 yards — which he set in Green Bay's 37-6 rout over the Bears on Oct. 6.

This one wasn't nearly as easy for the Packers, at least not for the first half.

The Bears dominated both the clock and the Packers in the first half but had to settle for a 7-7 halftime tie on Favre's 19-yard TD pass to Keith Jackson with 54 seconds left.

With the momentum on their side — along with the crowd after a rugged three-game road trip — the Packers broke through in the second half.

Desmond Howard's 75-yard punt return for a touchdown broke a 7-7 tie, and after a field goal pulled Chicago to 14-10, running back Dorsey Levens made it 21-10 with a 10-yard run with 12:40 left in the game.

Levens, a third-down specialist, gained a career-high 69 yards on five carries.

Favre's 1-yard sneak with 5:39 gave him his first rushing touchdown of the season after 31 touchdown passes and put Green Bay in command 28-10.

Dave Krieg's second TD throw to Bobby Engram with 1:55 remaining, a 5-yarder on fourth-and-2, capped a 16-play, 60-yard drive and the scoring. Jeff Thomason recovered the onside kick for Green Bay, which ran out the clock after Bears defensive tackle Jim Flanigan was ejected in the closing seconds.

Favre finished 19-for-27 for 231 yards and one TD. Krieg was 29 of 45 for 215 yards, two touchdowns and a late interception by Eugene Robinson.

Howard, who returned a punt 65 yards for a TD against San Diego earlier this year, became just the third player in Packers history to return two punts for scores in a season. The last was Willie Wood in 1961.

The Bears responded with a 34-yard field goal by Jeff Jaeger with 2:14 left in the third period to make it 14-10.

Chicago had the ball for 21 minutes, 49 seconds and 39 snaps in the first half, compared to the Packers' 8:11 and 17 snaps.

Neither team scored until 90 seconds remained in the first half.

Comedy, drama ingredients for art center AIDS benefit

SCOTT PHILLIPS
staff reporter

Emotion, comedy and drama were the ingredients for a local benefit musical Saturday evening at the Manhattan Performing Arts Center.

"An Evening With Andrew Lloyd Webber," directed by Thom Jackson, was the musical show performed in an effort to raise funds for the Regional AIDS Project.

The Manhattan Performing Arts Center played host to this show as a small crowd of about 65 people attended the fundraiser. The stage was set like a small living room. There were two old chairs and a couch, and the setting seemed to serve as a small home-like setting.

This was a great contrast to the performers themselves, who were dressed in lavish dresses for the women and conservative suits for the men.

Kicking off the show was an astounding solo by performer Joe Braun as he sang a ballad titled "Love Changes Everything."

Braun's energetic voice was a great start for the show. Everyone in the audience was hanging on to every word describing love, change and hope.

Throughout the first half of the show, the songs were all associated with similar themes of love, hope, dreams and their significance.

But when Linda Uthof and Kathy Slausen paired up to sing "Pie Jesu," the crowd was treated with the gift of hope through music.

Before the song, Slausen spoke to the audience about the fact that "Pie Jesu" was a song in Latin and that if the Christian overtones offended anyone, they should simply just listen to the music and think of hope and love for the benefit of those who have had their lives taken because of AIDS.

Many audience members cried as the other members of the show joined in with background vocals.

The stage was full as every member of the show sang and every member of the audience clung to every Latin word.

After intermission, the show continued with the emotional overtones in the music, as well as some comedy with songs such as "McCavity" from the Broadway musical hit "Cats."

The show ended with everyone in the show singing "As If We Never Said Good-Bye," which continued to bring the audience members to the edge of their seats with emotion and energy.

Overall, the musical show was outstanding. The performers were tremendous, the theme was positive and the crowd was pleased.

The only negative aspect was the fact that Manhattan should have had more people there to benefit the Regional AIDS Project.

GRADY HOOFER, senior in criminology, uses a duck call to lure ducks closer. He and his roommate, Eric Johnson, senior in recreation and park administration, also used floating duck decoys.

call of the HUNTERS

photos and story by cary conover

Waking up at 5 a.m. is just part of the job for students who hunt. To them, hunting is more than a leisure hobby.

"It's church," said Eric Johnson, senior in recreation and parks administration. "It's going out and enjoying what God's given us."

Sometimes, the enjoyment of hunting exceeds the need to sleep in.

"Right now, we'd be sleeping if we weren't out hunting. That's a waste of time," he said. "I can get all the sleep I need when I'm dead."

"It makes the day go by a lot better," Grady Hoofer, Johnson's roommate and senior in sociology, said about waking up early. He said hunting is a great way to start off the day, and it always goes well, regardless of what he comes back with.

He said in hunting, there is almost no so such thing as a bad day.

"Some days may be better than others, but it's pretty tough to have a bad one," Hoofer said.

The two hunt together at least two times per week during the duck season. Johnson said hunting is as much about the friendships that develop as it is about the nature of the sport.

"It's not really the kill or the catch that's important, it's just being able to get out there and be with your friends," Johnson said. "A lot of good conversation comes out when you're hunting. You can talk about the things that you'll never talk about anywhere else but when you're out hunting."

Many circumstances have to be right for a hunting trip to be successful. The weather is one element. Bad weather is an advantage, not a problem.

"The worse the weather is, the better the hunting, especially when it comes to duck hunting," Hoofer said. "Cloud cover, sleet, snow or any kind of moisture just seems to make for better hunting."

Hoofer said this kind of weather stirred the birds up a little and kept them moving.

The Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks said hunting seasons vary for different animals. For ducks, there are two segments of the season: from Nov. 2 to Dec. 15 and from Dec. 21 to Jan. 5.

Hoofer said the season is split to give the migrating ducks one week without being hunted. Hoofer said when ducks are not in season, they hunt turkey, dove, pheasant and quail.

Johnson and Hoofer said hunters need permission to hunt on private land.

"It takes five minutes, but it'll save you a lot of trouble, and you make everybody involved happy," Johnson said. "A few bad people can go out and screw it up for everybody else."

The costs of the hunting do not limit the two from continuing their sport. In fact, Johnson said his shotgun cost him an entire semester's tuition.

Hunting is a sport that involves gradual improvement and a lot of patience. One misconception of hunting is it lacks strategic aspects — all one must possess is a good eye for aiming.

"It's gotten more to the point where I want to outsmart whatever it is that I'm hunting. It's not 'I want to go out and kill it.' I want to be able to take it by being able to outsmart it," Johnson said.

Hoofer said, "Hunting's not about killing at all. It's about living."

BEFORE PACKING UP, Hoofer and Johnson hunker down as they watch ducks fly closer. They arrived at the site by 6 a.m., and they left after hunting for two hours.

A DECOY FLOATS in the water as Hoofer keeps his eye on a bird in the distance. About 20 duck decoys were used, in addition to duck calls, to lure ducks. Hoofer and Johnson were camouflaged and hiding behind a log.

ON THE WAY to the hunting area north of Randolph, Hoofer's dog, Sarge, gets some sleep in the back seat of Hoofer's truck. For this duck trip, the two used Ross, a Labrador retriever, to do the retrieving. The dogs don't play as important of a part in duck hunting as they do in pheasant or quail hunting, when they're actually hunting down and retrieving the birds.

ancient imperial palace, along with posters that read, "The risks of careless sex and lifestyle hygiene."

Health officials have warned that more than 1 million Chinese — 10 times the estimated present number — could be infected with HIV by 2000 if preventive measures are not taken.

In Thailand, which has an active sex industry, 420 gas stations distributed 3 million condoms to customers with the warning, "Be careful of AIDS when feeling naughty."

The health ministry and state-owned Petroleum Authority of Thailand sponsored the program. An estimated 800,000 of Thailand's 60 million people have the HIV virus, and 50,000 more have died of AIDS.

In the Philippine capital of Manila, about 250 government officials, activists and at least four HIV patients joined in the 1 1/4-mile First National AIDS Walk.

In Taipei, an AIDS awareness group displayed memorial quilt patches to honor victims of the disease.

Photo exhibitions carried the message in India, which volunteer organizations say has Asia's worst AIDS epidemic, with an estimated 1 million or more HIV cases.

Charity organizations sponsored marches in Bombay.

More than 400 people gathered in Tokyo for the lighting of a 20-foot tree bearing 12,000 red ribbons, a symbol of the fight against AIDS.

Europe warned against complacency.

In central Paris, several hundred AIDS activists marched with signs reading, "AIDS: The Epidemic Isn't Over" and "Zero Equals the Number of AIDS Survivors."

In Rome, two taxi companies distributed AIDS information leaflets to passengers and included similar messages on their telephone answering service.

Some players in Italy's top soccer league wore red bows on their soccer uniforms.

Dozens of candles were lighted at Madrid's Puerta de Alcala monument in memory of the estimated 5,000 AIDS victims to have died in the Spanish capital since 1981.

In South Africa, retired Archbishop Tutu, who won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1984 for his fight against apartheid, appeared in a TV advertisement to warn, "Our wonderful country faces a major crisis with HIV and AIDS spreading so fast. Please use a condom!"

Algeria had another solution.

Reminding audiences that AIDS has no cure, state-run media in Algeria recommended sexual abstinence as the only sure method of avoiding the disease.

Volleyball Championship title.

"Northland has a great tradition," Moore said. "They were a Division II powerhouse, and the first year they moved to Division I, they won the NIVC."

That tradition is something past Wildcats could only dream about. Now, with the first-ever tournament bid, senior Toie Young (who saw the Cats finish 7-21 her freshman year) said she has realized a dream.

"When you're recruited and you come in, you always think you're going to go," she said. "But after I got here and started the season, I didn't think we'd ever make it.

"This is really important. It means a lot to us and the program and the team."

Wednesday's match will begin at 7:30 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

The budget K-State submitted to the NCAA projected general admission ticket prices at $5 for the public, $3 for students. But assistant athletic director Cindy Fox said those numbers had not yet been confirmed.

K-State's position as the No. 16 school in the country in average attendance helped secure the home site for the first round. And Moore said he hopes fans continue to pack Ahearn for the tournament.

"I really hope everybody comes out on Wednesday," he said. "I hope we can get three to four thousand people there."

just wasn't working as hard as he needed to while posting up for the ball."

Eaker shared the same sentiments.

"I was posting up in the first half, but I was probably not as intense as I should have been," he said.

But while Eaker's offensive effort might have been lacking in the first half, he continued his strong defensive effort.

Coming off a two-block effort against UNC-Asheville, Eaker continued his dominating presence in the inside. In the first half against the Bears, Eaker tied a career high, recording four blocks. The total was the same amount he recorded against the Bears in last year's contest.

"Any time you have a player that can shoot, score and put pressure on you defensively, you are going to be in a lot of ballgames," Fuller said.

Asbury said Eaker's performance should help him in future games.

"This really should help his confidence level," he said. "We hope that he can build on this performance and become more consistent."

Who's Who at the Rec

Michelle Butler, building supervisor, began her employment with Recreational Services 1-1/2 years ago. She will graduate next August with a masters degree in speech pathology and plans to work with elementary and middle school children. Born and raised in Atwood, KS, Michelle likes Manhattan so much that she plans to stay here in this area for a few years beyond graduation — but she would eventually like to locate in the Boulder or Colorado Springs area.

Aaron DeJoia, native of Courtland, KS, has been a familiar sight around the Rec for the past 4 years. He is employed as both a building Ssupervisor and weight room maintenance technician, putting in from 20-25 hours each week keeping the fitness equipment in good working condition and working in the service area. Aaron will graduate next year with a B.S. in agronomy and environmental science and plans to work as an environmental consultant. Aaron said, "Working at the Rec has been an enjoyable experience for me because of the people I have met and worked with. And I have made many long lasting friendships."

FitnessFacts

As winter approaches, it is good to have a plan to avoid gaining those unwanted pounds. Set exercise goals that are realistic. Find a mode of exercise that you enjoy and that you'll be able to do during the chilly winter months. Any continuous movement that incorporates the large muscles of the body, including the legs and glutes, is suggested for fat reduction. These exercises include treadmill walking or running, stationary biking, cross country skiing, swimming, stair stepping, etc. Twenty to thirty minutes of continuous exercise 3-5 days per week could help keep away that unwanted winter weight gain.

Nutrition Notes

One pound of fat equals 3,500 kcal. That is a lot of food! Here's another way to look at fat and calories.

You would have to walk the length of a football field to work off just one M&M. Eat a small bag of M&M's, which weighs less than two ounces, and you'd have to walk the length of 55 football fields, or 3.3 miles, to burn it off.

What did you have for lunch the last time you ate at McDonald's? If you had a Big Mac, fries and a shake, you'd have to walk the distance of approximately 240 football fields to burn off your lunch.

Working It Out

Get ready for the holiday season and get a head start on your New Year's Resolutions! "A workout makes you better today than you were yesterday. It strengthens the body, relaxes the mind and toughens the spirit. When you work out regularly, your problems diminish and your confidence grows." (Author unknown)

Friday, Dec. 13, will be the last day of Wildcat Workout exercise sessions for the fall semester. Exercise sessions will resume Thursday, Jan. 16, 1997, with a NEW spring schedule. Call Rec Check at 532-6000 for days and times exercise sessions will be offered. Spring schedules will be ready for pick-up on Monday, Jan. 13, at the Recreation Complex or the Natatorium.

Office Closed

The office will close at 5 p.m. Tuesday, Dec. 24, for the holidays and will re-open Thursday, Jan. 2, at 8 a.m.

Fall semester lockers expire December 31. Please renew in the Recreational Services office now through Tuesday, Dec. 24. Late renewals will also be accepted Jan. 2.

Law officers want guidance on new marijuana laws

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — It's a tricky situation for a senator: Contend that your constituents were duped into passing a law legalizing medical use of illegal drugs — but somehow avoid offending those very constituents.

"How could this happen in Arizona?" Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., asked Monday at a hearing on the propositions passed Nov. 5 by voters in his state and in California, easing access to marijuana. "I am extraordinarily embarrassed."

He said he thinks most Arizona voters who supported it were deliberately deceived by sponsors of this proposition.

Arizona's electorate voted, 65 percent to 35 percent, to let doctors prescribe marijuana, heroin, LSD and methamphetamines for critically ill patients if there is scientific basis for their use.

The California proposition concerns only marijuana. Voters supported, 56 percent to 44 percent, legalizing marijuana cultivation, possession and use for medical reasons, with no prescription required.

Judiciary Committee chairman Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, and other senators sought increased enforcement of federal anti-drug laws to combat the propositions' impact.

Federal law enforcement officials have said they will pursue California and Arizona drug violators on a case-by-case basis, but have no specific plan yet.

"We're trying to puzzle through what our response will be," Barry McCaffrey, director of President Clinton's Office of National Drug Control Policy, told the hearing.

Hatch gave the administration until Jan. 1 to provide a description of federal policy and options.

"We can't let this go without a response," said Hatch.

John Walters, ONDCP's deputy director during the Bush administration, said the Clinton administration should have responded faster, given that the issue arose during the campaign and the election was a month ago.

"The law is on the books," he said. "The question is whether the officials in this administration are going to enforce it or not."

Walters called on the Drug Enforcement Administration to revoke

SGA cleans up fiscal-record mess with new hire

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

Student Governing Association hired a new accounting specialist to help clean up the mess in the SGA records.

Jennyfer Owensby will move from the controller's office to the Office of Student Activities and Services on Dec. 9.

"I'll be regulating campus privilege fee funds and making sure campus departments meet the specifications," Owensby said.

As accounting specialist, she will help re-establish the record-keeping, which has suffered in the last few years.

There were several instances of embezzlement from the Foundation Account and from student funds on deposit with the University last spring.

According to an internal audit report, falsified documents were used to make unauthorized withdrawals.

According to the audit report, "there were no records in the Office of Student Activities and Services showing receipts, payments, interest earned or the current balance in the Foundation bond proceeds account."

The report suggests stricter regulations for account transfers and more documentation in all accounts.

"We have a lack of records," Kelley Fink, interim director of the Office of Student Activities and Services, said. "That was the responsibility of the employee that was released."

Because of the lack of documentation, it is difficult to identify the reason for other deficits in SGA accounts like the Student Governing Operating account and the Student Activities Unallotted account.

"We don't know if we overallocated or if it was part of the embezzlement," Fink said.

As a result of the audit and the embezzlement, SGA and the Office of Student Activities and Services have hired experienced employees like Owensby to enforce regulations and prevent recurrences.

"We will probably set up some safeguards and divide the responsibility," Owensby said.

New students to encounter more elective choices in fall

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

Undergraduate students entering K-State in fall 1997 can expect to see a different kind of education than previous students.

Two years ago, the University General Education project was designed to make a larger number of general education or elective classes available for undergraduate students.

While now many students take nearly all of their elective classes from the College of Arts and Sciences, with UGE, different colleges at K-State would have classes available for non-majors.

"The question asked was 'What is our understanding of what an educated graduate from K-State is like?' " said David Balk, the acting director of the School of Family Studies and Human Services and a member of the UGE assessment task force.

Balk said the UGE project team decided one answer to that question would be self-defeating and that the goal of the UGE was to expand K-State students' opportunities for undergraduate education.

"Students can gain breadth to their education," Balk said.

The framework of UGE is based on three points, according to David Royse, member of the UGE implementation task force, and associate professor of music education.

First, Royse said, the UGE will improve general education, because more classes will be taught in a more interactive way.

He said the hands-on methods used in these classes will benefit students.

"Retention is better with hands-on learning," he said.

Second, he said UGE will increase the level of general education

AIDS quilt opens at K-State

Members of the community placed roses beneath the panels of the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt in remembrance of loved AIDS victims.

Several family members, faculty and students gathered Monday morning in the K-State Student Union art gallery for the opening ceremony.

Emotions were high as Don Fallon, chairman of the K-State Communicable Disease Committee, welcomed the crowd.

The four panels of the NAMES Project AIDS Memorial Quilt were brought to K-State for several reasons.

WORLD AIDS DAY

▶ The panels will be displayed in the K-State Student Union art gallery from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. today through Friday.

▶ For past coverage of AIDS week activities and information, check out the Electronic Collegian archives at (http://collegian.ksu.edu).

"The chief reason for hosting the quilt is to remember the persons that died," Fallon said.

However, the quilt serves another purpose. It is used as an educational tool to help fight the disease, he said.

"It is time to examine our own attitudes and behaviors," Fallon said. "AIDS is becoming a worldwide disease."

People must also realize that HIV and AIDS can affect everyone.

"Illness knows no boundaries. It knows no limits," said Mike Lynch, vice president of educational and personal development programs.

Seeing the quilt had a deep emotional effect on Fallon. It helps share the names of those who have touched our lives, Fallon said.

"We are here as a family to give support to those who have lost someone with the disease," Fallon said.

After a moment of silence to remember those with AIDS, names from the quilt were read as students and guests were given a first official look at the quilt.

During closing ceremonies on Friday, new panels will be presented to the AIDS quilt project. Included in the presentation will be a K-State signature panel. Students, faculty and guests can sign the panel as they tour the AIDS project, Reita Currie, Lafene Health Center educator, said.

"Illness knows no boundaries. It knows no limits."

Chilling discovery

Scientists find ice on moon that may help in space exploration

STORY BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS • ARTWORK BY JUSTIN STAHLMAN

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The moon, long thought to be bone dry, has a pond of ice hidden deep inside a crater, scientists disclosed Monday, increasing chances that humans may someday live on its surface.

The discovery came from the Clementine spacecraft, which used radar signals to examine the depths of the moon's deep craters.

Officials at the Pentagon, who co-sponsored the project with NASA, planned an announcement of the findings at a news conference Tuesday.

"If you could wish for any one thing there to make it easier to explore with, it would be water," said Anthony Cook, astronomical observer at the Griffith Observatory in Los Angeles.

The ice was found in a large crater deep in the south pole of the moon, said Rick Lehner, spokesman for the Pentagon's Ballistic Missile Defense Organization. He said that a panel of scientists has concluded that the ice is frozen water.

"It is an extremely significant discovery," said Cook, adding that water would make exploration easier.

"With water there you could have enclosed areas to grow plants, grow your own food, make your own fuel, make your own air," he said. "You don't have to launch all that stuff from big rockets on the Earth."

Lehner said the crater is twice the size of Puerto Rico and 13 kilometers deep, or higher than Mount Everest, the tallest peak on earth. He said the ice formation is the size of a small lake and is between 10 and 100 feet deep.

"People have theorized that there may be water on the moon but the (six) Apollo missions didn't find any evidence," he said.

Scientists believe that about 3.6 billion years ago, a comet crashed into the moon, and water droplets on its tail were left in the bottom of the crater, the deepest hole in the solar system, he said.

Because the south side of the moon is always dark, the temperatures in this crater are about minus 382 degrees Fahrenheit, or nearly as cold as any environment can ever get. The water couldn't escape from the crater's "cold traps," he said.

Lehner said the water can be used for drinking, turned into breathable oxygen and transformed into fuel, allowing humans to • LAUNCH OF MARS PROBE ON SCHEDULE. NASA scientists hoped Monday for no further delays in launching a Mars spacecraft carrying the first-ever interplanetary rover. The Mars Pathfinder was to take off aboard an unmanned rocket at 2:03 a.m. Monday, but rain, clouds and strong winds pushed back the launch by 24 hours. NASA's Global Surveyor was launched in early November and is already on its way to Mars.

• SALVI FAMILY SAYS OFFICIALS ARE LYING. Attorneys and the parents of abortion-clinic attacker John Salvi III charged Monday that prison officials are lying when they claim there were no warnings the convicted double-murderer was suicidal. They called for independent state and federal investigations into Salvi's prison-cell death. State officials say it apparently was a suicide, but one of Salvi's lawyers said the inmate's hands and feet were tied. Salvi, 24, was convicted of first-degree murder for the killings of two women who were working at two abortion clinics in Brookline. He was sentenced to life without possibility of parole.

• U.N. BODY LAUNCHES EFFORT TO PROTECT INTERNET. People surfing the Wide World Web, downloading songs and novels, could cost the music and publishing industries billions of dollars.

The U.N. body that oversees the lucrative world of copyright and patent protection opened a three-week conference Monday, hoping to catch up with the sweeping changes caused by computers and the Internet.

The event was organized after it became obvious something had to be done to protect authors' and performers' rights in a world in which the latest song or computer program can be downloaded in seconds.

Delegates to the conference, organized by the 160-nation U.N. World Intellectual Property Organization, are working on the first large revision of international copyright law in 25 years.

• MOTHER TERESA IN CRITICAL CONDITION. Mother Teresa, 86, was in critical condition and using an oxygen mask Monday, but the 86-year-old nun showed signs of recovery as she sat in a chair reading a Bible. Doctors were worried about the condition of her kidneys and lungs following a heart attack and an angioplasty, but still were optimistic that she would recover enough to return to her work of caring for the poor. The hospital switchboard was jammed all afternoon after rumors swept Calcutta that Mother Teresa had died.

• SHIITE MUSLIM LEADER GUNNED DOWN. The leader of a Shiite militant group was shot and killed outside his home in central Punjab province. Masked gunmen on a motorcycle opened fire on Syed Baqar Zaidi on Sunday in the town of Multan, according to the Muslim, an English-language daily. Zaidi was head of Sipah-e-Mohammed or Soldiers of Mohammed, which often clashes with a Sunni militant group known as the Guardians of the Friends of the Prophet. No one has taken responsibility for the killing.

• FATAL FIRE CAUSED BY CARELESS SMOKING. Careless smoking was the apparent cause of an apartment fire that killed one person and left scores of others injured in Kansas City. The blaze started about noon Sunday in the victim's second-story apartment at the Royal Tower apartments. Officials believed the victim's smoking caused the blaze. Royal Tower was home to mostly senior citizens on government assistance. It suffered $500,000 in damage and more in losses to the residents' belongings, and 32 people went to the hospital.

SPORTS

• MUMME TO COACH AT KENTUCKY. Valdosta State football coach Hal Mumme was hired Monday as coach at Kentucky and given a four-year contract. Athletic director C.M. Newton introduced Mumme at a news conference that followed Mumme's approval by the school's athletics board. Mumme fills the vacancy left by the firing of Bill Curry on Oct. 21.

Before that, Mumme was 25-10 in three seasons at Iowa Wesleyan. When he took over the Iowa Wesleyan program in 1989, the team was coming off a 0-10 season and returning only three players. In Mumme's first year, Iowa Wesleyan improved to 7-4. In 1991, he moved that program up to NAIA Division I, where Iowa Wesleyan was 10-2 and ranked No. 7.

• HANSPARD REACHES 2,000 YARDS. Texas Tech's Byron Hanspard, only the sixth running back in NCAA history to rush for more than 2,000 yards in a season, won the Doak Walker Award on Monday. In a three-man final among juniors, Hanspard edged Iowa State's Troy Davis and Northwestern's Darnell Autry for the honor, which goes to college football's best running back. Hanspard will receive the award Tuesday.

It's that time of year again, so let it snow, let it snow, let it snow.

Of course, most students at K-State dread the weather, the bone-chilling wind and the icy blasts of snow.

Most of all, they fear not getting to classes without making a fool of themselves by wiping out on the front steps of Willard Hall.

Thanks to snow-removal service on campus, most students will make it to classes unscathed.

Three departments remove snow from different areas on campus.

All parking lots on campus are cleared by a company Parking Services contracts with. Grounds Maintenance does all sidewalks, and facilities clears all campus streets.

"The police department will call in and tell us when to have the snow removal done. We spread a mixture of sand and ice melt," Randy Slover, director of facilities maintenance, said.

Facilities will use several truckloads of sand and ice-melt mixture to clear the streets. Facilities clears the streets such as Petticoat Lane and Lover's Lane. It does not clear any city streets that are done by a separate entity.

Slover said facilities bought the trucks and sandspreaders from the Kansas Department of Transportation.

"As for snow, it looks like we will get a lot this year," he said.

The mixture of sand and ice melt is not straight salt. Ice melt is a potassium-chloride mix, Peggy Winkler, acting director of Parking Services, said.

"For Parking Services, every year we submit bids for snow removal, which is good for one year. We are required to do this every year as a competitive bid," Winkler said.

Removal starts with the accumulation of three or more inches of snow, and the K-State Police will contact facilities to have snow removal begin.

"Of course, if it snows four inches over a break, we could do it ourselves. There isn't a lot of traffic, so we could get the most heavily used areas cleared by ourselves," Winkler said.

Last year the snow-removal service was never used by Parking Services.

"If we do not need to use their services, we do not have to pay them anything. We only get charged if we use them. We are charged by the equipment used, the operator and how much time they spend removing the snow. Sandspreaders, for instance, are $70 an hour, and the operator is $12 an hour," Winkler said.

The campus sidewalks and stoops are cleared by grounds and custodial services.

"We use the Hustler mowers in the winter for snow removal. We put a cab on them and a broom or blade. There hasn't been a whole lot of snow to remove since I started three years ago," John Ott, director of facilities services, said.

Unlike other departments, grounds is not notified by the campus police to remove snow. It has a staff member who keeps a close eye on weather and will call in employees when the weather gets bad.

"We'll call people in for snow removal starting at 4 a.m. We'll have a crew of 10-12 people come in at that time, and then the rest will start at 8 a.m. to give them a break," Ott said.

Custodial employees do the buildings stoops out to the sidewalks, where grounds takes over, he said.

Home stretch

A STEADY flow of vehicles crosses the Kansas River bridge Sunday night as students return from Thanksgiving Break. Because most campus housing was closed, many students did not return until Sunday.

K-State online scholarship application simplifies student financial aid process

Heather Hjetland
staff reporter

Applying for scholarships just got easier. Now K-State students can apply on the World Wide Web.

The scholarship can be found by going to the Office of Student Financial Assistance's home page at (www.ksu.edu/sfa). The application is the first item to select.

"This is the first time K-State's had an online scholarship application," said Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance.

"We thought this was an easy way for students to accomplish the application process," he said.

The application allows students to be considered for unrestricted, departmental and college scholarships.

Moeder said the online application will save time for students and the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

He said it will save students time because they will not have to pick up the form, complete it and return it to Fairchild Hall.

The new application can be completed anywhere there is Web access.

It will also save the financial-aid office time because the faculty will not have to key each application into the computer system.

Another feature of the new application is the financial aid office can send each student's application to the appropriate college through the Web.

For example, if an engineering student submits an application, it goes to the Financial Aid office and then to the College of Engineering office by computer, Moeder said.

The application is due Feb. 1. Students can still apply using the paper form.

Completing the application involves listing background information, activities and honors.

The application was put online in September, with the help of the Office of Information Systems.

Typically 7,500 students apply for scholarships each year, Moeder said.

About 4,600 scholarships will be given, awarding $5 million total.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Help sway Cotton Bowl invitation in our favor

WHY WE CARE

Now is the time for K-Staters to shine and to let the Cotton Bowl officials know that we have more spirit than any other team.

It's officially bowl season, and football fans all around Manhattan and in Kansas are getting excited about the expected appearance of K-State in a New Year's Day bowl.

Now is the time, K-State fans, to get enthused about the bowl game.

Now is the time to make your reservations and buy your tickets for the Cotton Bowl.

Now is the time to make your travel arrangements and make road-trip plans to Dallas.

Remember, K-State fans, you are the bread and butter for K-State's expected debut on New Year's Day on CBS.

Last year Colorado was invited to Dallas but had very poor fan attendance, and it was not invited back this year. Under normal bowl conditions, the No. 2 team in the Big 12 would go to the Cotton Bowl, but officials don't want Colorado back. They want a team that will bring a lot of revenue into Dallas. A team with fans who will support their school with loyalty and with dignity.

K-Staters, this is your opportunity to shine. Forget all the gibberish in the past. Forget the loss to Nebraska.

Call for information, and encourage the Cotton Bowl officials to invite K-State.

If the officials see there are many interested fans, they will probably lean toward asking K-State to the bowl.

What a great accomplishment that would be for the Wildcat football program.

Sure, it isn't official just yet.

A few things have to fall into place in Coach Bill Snyder's favor. But in the meantime, all loyal fans can call the Alumni Association or Bramlage Coliseum and get reservations for this game.

Ticket packages are available, and travel packages are available.

If you want to go to Dallas to celebrate the New Year, you must prepare now.

It is your duty as fans, as lovers of wisdom and as pigskin enthusiasts to push K-State toward its first New Year's Day bowl game. You don't have to spend any money. All you have to do is make the call.

All you have to do is get enthused.

WOMEN hear us roar?

Sisterhood lies in sticking together, not in scrutinizing each other

MY

Keely SCHIELDS

Where has this semester gone?

Seems like only yesterday I was chatting steadily through my fourth and final week of sorority Rush. Now here it is December already, and I see that I have only two columns left to write in my two-semester stint with the Collegian.

Looking back, I find I've said a healthy chunk of the things I'd set out to say — and then some. Even so, I see that I've said comparatively little about a subject that crosses my mind every day.

Therefore, I'm going to tread into women's territory with these last two columns. And what territory could belong more exclusively to women than women's restrooms?

In these places, one can find women standing in front of mirrors, blotting fresh applications of lipstick and poking at renegade strands of hair. They fuss not so much because their appearance matters to them, but because it matters to the world.

Here on K-State's campus, there is quite a difference among bathroom mirrors. Some are kinder than others.

The mirrors in the women's restrooms in Eisenhower Hall receive a considerable amount of daylight and tend toward brutality in their reflections. For a kinder reflection, I recommend the women's restroom on the ground floor of Denison Hall. The light in there falls more softly on the mirror, bestowing a warm glow on those who gaze into it. Although this mirror won't try to tell a woman she's the fairest of them all, it won't search out and pick on every imperfection, either.

It's a kinder way to be seen.

But women share more than restrooms and their mirrors. I say women cross my mind on a daily basis, but in truth, gender itself doesn't have to cross, because it exists continually throughout every part. Being a woman colors every thought I have. My gender is the single-most important factor in who I am, just as it is for anybody else.

All women share this essential determinant of who they are. Hence, my being a woman connects me with rich women and impoverished women, lesbians and celibate women, Native American and black women, debutantes and grandmothers, Christian wives and Muslim wives, European women and South American women, and so on and so on ...

Regardless of how our experiences might differ specifically, the world first responds to all of us as women.

Even as this common thread runs through the experience of all women, it obviously isn't strong enough to really unify women. On the contrary, something makes women only too happy to pick up scissors and sever it themselves.

The severing begins in little ways. A woman enters a room. For whatever reason, she briefly attracts all eyes. Then Mary and Jane, who are already in the room, turn to one another and murmur about how tastelessly dressed, how fat and how promiscuous the new arrival is.

A little later on, Mary participates in a women's unity ritual — going to the bathroom with a pack of other women. Standing in front of the mirror touching up her hair, Mary mentions to her pack what a fat, poorly dressed slut Jane is.

This particular scenario doesn't amount to much, but it illustrates how even in unity, women often divide themselves from others.

When I mention the word "sorority," it probably calls to mind a group of young women wearing greek letters rather than the word's literal meaning, "sisterhood." The greek-letter organization is an idea borrowed from men, but for the women within these groups, sisterhood is precisely what they provide.

Sororities provide a positive experience for their members. For a short time, women get to live and take life with other women. Afterward, they move on to the part of life when it's every woman for herself.

What needs to be said, though, is that women don't need greek letters to have sorority. In fact, greek sororities don't provide anything women couldn't achieve on their own. They simply provide a little push in that direction.

As a sorority member, I appreciate that push. However, I'm troubled by the fact that the push is given only within the group. On the exterior, sororities include or exclude according to their own tastes in women.

It's disturbingly reminiscent of men scoping babes at a bar, and it makes for antagonism between members of different sororities, and between members and non-members. The division created becomes yet another excuse for women to hand each other poisoned apples.

It seems to me I belong to a generation of women less inhibited and more open-minded than any before it. We have fewer obstacles to keep us from organizing ourselves without scoping one another — without excluding one another.

Women could become one another's kinder mirrors. Instead of scrutinizing what makes us different, we could strive to reflect that one great characteristic that makes us the same.

5 days in Chicago

26 high-school students, 1 student teacher and a parent

MY

Christy LITTLE

Field trips.

For me, they invoke memories of a day at Kaleidoscope, the cold wind on top of Liberty Memorial and the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art. My only overnight field trip was at a journalism camp at the Adam's Mark Hotel. My adviser was with us during the day, then returned home while the five girls and four guys on the trip, innocent as lambs, stayed up late watching stupid movies in our respective rooms.

I admit I knew right off that my students' five-day visit to Chicago would not go so smoothly.

I was actually the only trip sponsor who knew all the students. My adviser did not go with us; she was invited to speak in France the same week and wisely chose the all-expenses-paid trip to Europe. An English teacher was rounded up, and a student's mother bravely volunteered to go as well. A student teacher cannot be liable for the students (or at least, not yet), so these other two adults were going for the sole purpose that someone could be sued if necessary. Now think of all the dangers one can find in Chicago with 26 high-school students — makes your mind reel, doesn't it? — and know that I slept very little the week before we left.

These were also not the blessed, church-bound types I would have nary a worry about. Several proclaimed they would smoke, rules or no rules, and yet others already arranged to meet up with attractive members of the opposite sex whom they met at past conventions. They begged for roommates who would not narc on them, a request we pointedly ignored.

Our first night was a little rough, as we quickly sorted out the cigarettes and girls-in-the-room mess. About the only positive thing I could say is that thank goodness no one within our group liked one another. Stopping an impending intragroup romance would have been as easy as halting a train wreck. All seven student rooms were door-to-door and across the hall, while the two sponsors and I were placed well around the corner and out of earshot. As a result, this required some late nights on our part as far as patrolling the halls.

But nights were the only time we really had to worry, as 4,500 more students checked in the subsequent days. During the day, we went to journalism sessions, visited the Shedd Aquarium and shopped. For dinner, the students wanted to go anywhere they could score a T-shirt, regardless of cost. We put in the three-hour wait at Planet Hollywood and the Hard Rock Cafe (highly overrated, I might add) so that such T-shirts could be purchased. Meanwhile, I cursed my own inept math skills as tables of 12 handed me bundles of tens, twenties and traveler's cheques with a receipt and begged me to help them figure it out. I drove waiters up the wall, as if my extremely loud and volatile charges hadn't already done a good enough job.

Most of the time I wished I could have just relaxed a little more. But it was terribly hard not to act like my mother, calling for a buddy system and fussing over taxis with bizarre-looking drivers.

This fear was supplemented by the following:

"Guess what, Christy!" (the kids were usually allowed to call me by my first name on the trip, as Miss Little drives me nuts).

"What?" I asked warily. We were outside the Hard Rock Cafe on a Saturday night. A strip club was across the street, and some unsavory-looking individuals were drooling at a few of my girls.

"Our taxi driver murdered someone!"

I looked at them with raised eyebrows. "He killed someone while you were in the car?" I was definitely going to have to talk to the English teacher about this.

"No," they said in unison. Sharon added, "He just said he had once before. When he got mad at someone.

"He was mad in the car because someone cut him off," she added.

"He's been in jail for 22 years! He just got out!" Jenny exclaimed.

"Did you tip him?" I asked nervously.

"Oh, yeah. He told us some great stories. And he told us —" Sharon's mouth was quickly covered by a giggling Jenny. "Uh, never mind," she said.

We walked back from the Hard Rock Cafe that night.

It was an enjoyable trip overall, and my 26 charges returned unscathed and relatively possessing the same morals with which they left. I only found out later the reason why all the boys wanted to sit with John on the plane. As I was purchasing some chewing gum, John innocently chatted with me in line, cleverly hiding the Playboy he planned to read all the way home.

K-State spirit shined through rain

Editor,

The Homecoming parade Nov. 23 was one of the greatest parades I've witnessed.

Congratulations to the students who built floats and walked alongside the great floats. It looked like half the K-State student body was in the parade. Their spirit was great. They sure didn't let the damp, rainy weather dampen their spirits.

I am glad the football team topped off the event with a win over Iowa State.

P.S. I like the job you are doing with the Collegian. Keep up the good work.

Victim's emotional pain after rape is worse than the physical pain

Editor,

I want to respond to Charle Sioux Charleton's discourse about the long-lasting effect of rape. The incident itself is traumatic, but the aftereffects, while different for each victim, are probably more destructive.

I was raped six days before my wedding. That was three years ago, but every year I am compelled to remember that anniversary before I can celebrate the other anniversary. I still can barely stay in my own home by myself. (It was not the site of the attack.) Frightening mental movies of possible violent attacks play through my head whenever I am in a vulnerable situation. I have not lost trust in friends because the rapist was a stranger who entered my room in the hour just before dawn, but because he was masked, I look with suspicion and anger at any male with the same physique. The predawn hours, formerly a time of peace and reflection, are now charged with anxiety. I will never be able to live by myself. All this because some young man, probably egged on by his friends, had something to prove.

Like Charle, I am redisturbed by every new report of rape, by the attempts to blame the victim — what was she doing there at that time? In those clothes? — and by the ever-lengthening roll of names of the women who continue to be abused in all ways by males who don't have a clue what it means to be a man.

Reader says Collegian articles exaggerated risk of AIDS

Editor,

Your articles on AIDS on Dec. 2 were very slanted. You conveyed the message that anyone can get AIDS.

This is simply not the case. You can not contract HIV, which causes AIDS, unless you engage in illicit sex or homosexual sex, or "shoot up" with used hypodermic needles. True, there are a number of cases in which none of these things happened, but for the vast majority of HIV- and AIDS-infected people, at least one of these activities took place.

Now you will label me a "homophobe" or a hating bigot because there is no such thing as a biased press in this modern day. Well, so be it.

University administrators should decide on fate of Denison Hall

Editor,

We are writing to express our displeasure with the aesthetic appeal of Denison Hall. The hall blocks the newly renovated collegiate gothic library. In addition, the English department is inadequately housed.

According to University officials, the removal of the hall is imminent, although there has been a lack of consistent facts among University administrators.

There are unconfirmed reports that the English department will relocate to Lafene Health Center or Willard or Justin halls, although, upon questioning officials, there has not been one definite answer. The result has been misinformation to students, faculty and administrators.

For example, according to officials in the English department, because the removal will happen at some point, the department has reached a standstill while trying to obtain new computers and improve facilities.

This is due to the fact that the hall will eventually be removed.

It is cost-effective for the hall to be removed. A University architect said it is estimated that with the removal of Denison and renovation of an existing building, the cost will be an estimated $500,000. And upgrading Denison, which is not handicapped-accessible, will cost at least half that amount. Plus, it will solve the problem of the English department's being stretched into three different buildings.

We believe University officials should speed up the removal of the hall and come together on one possible relocation.

We also encourage students to take a closer look at exactly what Denison Hall is blocking and the beauty that is hidden behind its deteriorating walls.

Club team ends season

ANDREW FRANCIS
staff reporter

The K-State women's soccer club ended its season with losses against three tough opponents in Austin, Texas, at a national tournament for club soccer teams Nov. 21-22.

Going into the tournament, the Wildcats knew they would be playing three games in two days, but the team was hoping it would advance into the second round of the tournament.

On Nov. 21, the Cats fought a tough battle with the defending champion Miami of Ohio. The game was tied at halftime, but Miami was able to pull away in the second half and and beat the Cats 2-0.

Later that day, K-State had a match against Salt Lake City Community College. Salt Lake City came out strong and beat the Cats 2-0. The Cats had a night to recuperate before facing James Madison University. K-State played another close match, but James Madison prevailed with a 1-0 victory.

> • VICTOR ATUGHONU
> WOMEN'S SOCCER COACH

Victor Atughonu, coach of the women's soccer team, said he was pleased with the way the team played in Austin.

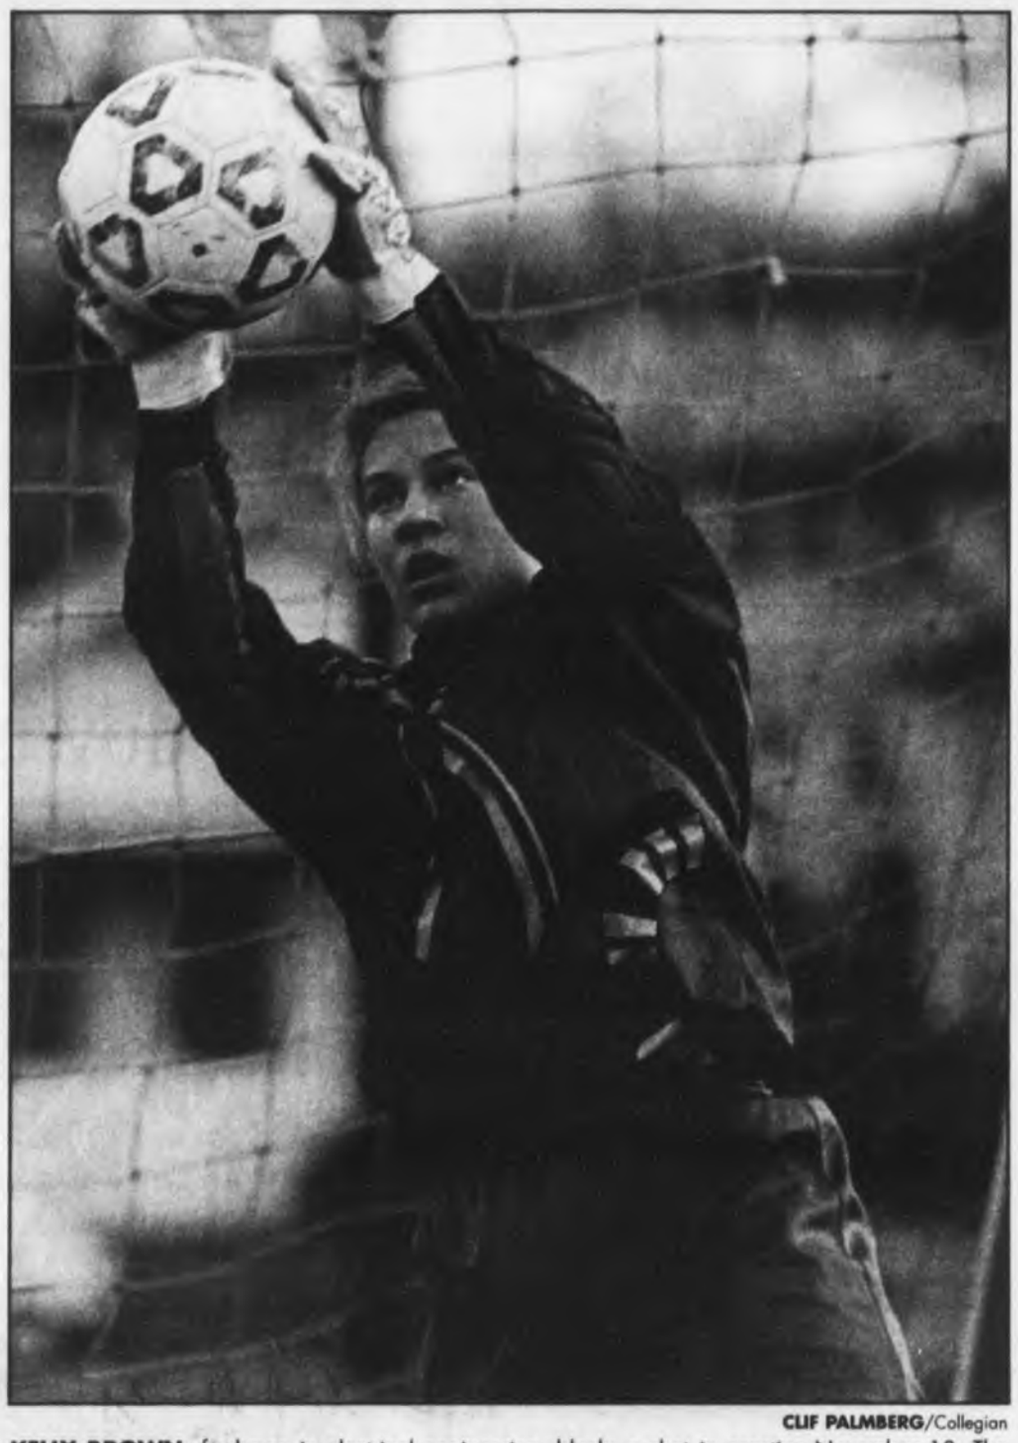
"We did everything we were supposed to do," he said. "We lacked a mid-fielder and a sweeper, but we still came out and did well."

The Cats were without mid-fielder Lindsay Weir, who tore ligaments in her ankle earlier in the season.

Carey Stephens was not able to make the Austin trip, because she suffered a concussion against Nebraska one week before the Austin tournament.

Atughonu said Kelly Brown, goalkeeper for the team, was one of the best players in the tournament.

"She saved our butt. Everyone at the tournament was complimenting her," he said.



Brown said the team had high expectations, but she said the opposing teams would be a challenge.

"With teams coming from the East Coast and the West Coast, I felt like the competition was going to be tough," Brown said.

Although the tournament turned out to be disappointing for the team, the progress the team has made during the semester has provided it with the hope and desire to continue improvement.

Last spring, the women's soccer team did not have enough members to field a team. Now the team is looking forward to having a strong spring season.

"We hope to keep the majority of our team together and hope for a varsity team in the future," Brown said.

Officials have finger on trigger

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

Coach Bill Snyder and the rest of the Wildcat football program are still waiting for a bowl invitation.

After much deliberation, Cotton Bowl officials said on Monday they will wait until the conclusion of the Big 12 championship game this Saturday to reveal any results or offer any invitations.

Sports information director Kent Brown said a couple of things play into the delay of the official announcement.

"The Cotton Bowl officials are not in a big hurry to pull the trigger," he said. "They want to let everything play out this weekend, and then they'll go from there."

K-State seems to be the provincial favorite for the New Year's Day game, but there are still too many questions to make a fair and accurate assumption.

There are four teams from four different conferences who get automatic bids to the three alliance bowl games. At-large teams will fill the two remaining spots.

The Sugar Bowl gets the first two picks in the polls and is certain to take No. 1 Florida State after it defeated in-state rival Florida this past weekend. The only other team already in the alliance is Big East champion Virginia Tech, which will most likely play in the Orange Bowl.

After the Sugar Bowl sets its preview, the Fiesta Bowl gets the third and fifth picks, and the Orange Bowl gets fourth and sixth.

The alliance invitations are prized because they offer an $8.4-million payout to each team. No other bowls, excluding the Rose Bowl, offer more than $3 million.

Champions from the Big 12, the Atlantic Coast Conference, the Big East and the Southeastern Conference all receive automatic bids to the alliance.

Nebraska, 10-1, plays Texas, 7-4, this Saturday to determine the Big 12 champion. If Nebraska wins, it will certainly play Florida State in the Sugar Bowl. Florida, 10-1, saddles up against Alabama, 9-2, for the SEC championship in Atlanta on Saturday; however, if either of the two favorites lose, the alliance has a huge mess to deal with, and the Cats might not be picking cotton but remembering the Alamo.

So all K-State fans can do is wait until the championship games are over.

Brown said K-State was on the top of a short list of Cotton Bowl prospects, which would make its official announcement Sunday at 4:30 p.m. on CBS.

"Nebraska is on that list, especially if they would lose the championship," he said. "Right now, CBS has very little play in the situation, and their associates want to keep their options open."

Meanwhile, those who have a predilection for Wildcats can purchase bowl tickets from the K-State Alumni Association or through the Bramlage Ticket office.

"Interested people can call the the ticket office at Bramlage and purchase a ticket for the bowl game only," Karen Shafer, alumni foundation center, said.

Shafer said the association is in a holding pattern right now because it received word that it had to wait on bowl arrangements.

Shafer also said the ticket office had bowl packages available that varied in price range depending on what fans wanted.

"The best thing to do is just call and talk to personnel," she said.

Women start 3-game road trip at Ohio

DAN LEWERENZ
sports writer

Whenever a new coach comes on board, there's a concerted effort to forget the past and concentrate on the present.

But when the Wildcats, 4-0, face the University of Ohio in Athens tonight, it will be hard to forget last year's game.

Last year the Bobcats handed K-State a 69-68 loss in Bramlage Coliseum. But it was more than just a one-point loss — the Cats went scoreless in the game's last 1:55, allowing Ohio's Natalie Britt to score the game's final five points.

K-State had one final chance to win the game, but Carlene Mitchell's jumper fell short, giving the Cats their second-straight loss.

Britt is one of four returning starters in the Ohio lineup, and the Bobcats, 1-1, have already played No. 9 Notre Dame within 13, 95-82.

"This game against Ohio is going to be a great test," Coach Deb Patterson said. "They played Notre Dame tough, and Notre Dame is ranked No. 9 in the nation this year.

"We've said Grambling State had the quickness we would see in Big 12 play. Ohio has the size, the strength in the post, we'll have to be used to in our conference."

Going into the game, Brit Jacobson leads the Cats with 19.8 points per game. Andria Jones is averaging 19.3 points, and Missy Decker has 11.5.

Historically speaking, the Ohio game might have serious implications for the Cats. Since 1969, K-State has averaged 22 wins per season when starting 5-0. A 4-1 start means just a 17-win season.

The Ohio stop will be K-State's first on a three-game road trip this week. The Wildcats land in Moscow, Idaho, for the Idaho Tournament on Friday and Saturday. The Cats will play Texas-El Paso in the first round, with host Idaho or Eastern Michigan waiting Saturday.

Gridiron road trip 1997: You gotta bag it up no matter where the bowl picture takes the Cats

MY

Jon BALMER

As the clock ticks down, loyal and eager K-State football fanatics wait to receive an answer to the troubling issue on their mind: Where do the Cats go to bowl?

Yes, the resolution of this question had yet to be answered when this column was completed, so if you're already bathing in cotton, I apologize. However, if the issue is still up in the air, I have a suggestion to help pass the time: Start planning a road trip. It's the only logical and time-consuming thing a Purple People-Eater can do.

Now, although the destination of this asphalt odyssey is yet to be discovered, there is still plenty to plan in order to achieve maximum road-tripping.

The first issue at hand is transportation. The ideal ride for covering the country is a Winnebago, the Hercules of the highway. The multicolored behemoth comes equipped with large seats, restroom facilities and sometimes even a stove. With road-trip luxuries like these, the trip will be handled with ease. However, if you or your friends don't have access to one of these enormous beauties, a van or spacious car will do you right.

Let's move on to another issue of importance — the grub. Before departing for the bowl destination, stock up on all the little things your stomach will beg for during the trip. A few suggestions I can offer from prior road-tripping would be sunflower seeds, Slim Jim beef jerky (you know, the kind endorsed by pro-wrestler Randy "Macho Man" Savage), and Pringles chips galore.

To suit the beverage department, IBC root beer will quench all your thirst needs. Although it will add extra stops at the local Stuckey's restroom, IBC does a body good. If this beverage is unattainable, look to either Mountain Dew or Tahitian Treat to find a suitable replacement.

No road trip is ready and raring to go without the proper tunes, so make sure not to overlook this vital category. When selecting the music, remember three important questions: Is there a synthesizer solo? Does it feature the words Milli or Vanilli? And have people been known to burn this compact disc? If you can honestly answer no to these questions, you're in the clear. Be careful, though. Although 1970s funk and classic 1980s jams will boost your road-trip experience, "Macarena Mix 1996" might induce madness and inability to operate heavy machinery, resulting in a road-trip tragedy.

Once the carry-on items have been selected, it's time to transform the automobile you'll be riding in into a Purple-powered Willie wagon. This metamorphosis begins by adding the necessary Powercat magnets to the sides of the ride. Then whip out the shoe polish and brand the car with slogans and sayings galore ("Jump back Jack, Cats on the Attack," "Kavanagh Krusade '97" or "Crazy Cats on the prowl" are just a few graffiti suggestions).

Before hittin' the highway, the transportation needs a good-luck mascot to watch over and assure a safe journey to bowl country. In the past, I've ridden in vans guided by miniature bears and stuffed tigers, and the results have always been good.

To bring the Cats a big-time victory, a miniature Willie-doll hood ornament is a good way to start. However, there are many mascot options. Take one of those crappy stuffed Dalmatians McDonald's is giving away, paint it purple, and strap it to the antenna of your car, thus transforming it into the Shaggin' Wagon. Or, if you fancy yourself an extreme Catbacker, the statue of Johnny Kaw sitting on the corner of 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue makes a handy addition to the luggage rack. I don't suggest this one, however, because it probably will include some legal trouble and might result in a chase scene reminiscent of the "Dukes of Hazzard."

Once you have tackled all these important road-trip essentials, there's nothing left to do except fill up the tank and set sail for warmer climates. While I went to extreme measures to compile this cross-country checklist, there are still many other areas yet to be covered. So grab the necessary P-Funk music, attach a mascot to the hood of your Chevy van, and stow away the Dew, because by the time all the road-trip paraphernalia is packed, K-State will have a bowl destination.

Men's basketball attempts to electrify crowd when it faces Shockers

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

K-State faces its toughest competition so far this season tonight when it squares off against the Wichita State Shockers at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Wildcats are coming off an 85-66 win against Mid-Eastern Atlantic Conference foe Morgan State, a win that gave the Wildcats a confidence booster heading into tonight's matchup.

"Every time we win a game, it's something to build on," guard Aaron Swartzendruber said. "We can look back and see what we can improve on for later games."

Swartzendruber showed true grit against Morgan State on Saturday when he achieved a career-high nine rebounds.

"The bottom line is that we want to win," Swartzendruber said. "I'll do whatever it takes to win."

Coach Tom Asbury said the team's competition is steadily getting tougher as the season progresses.

"It's going to become more and more difficult if nothing else," Asbury said. "We need to play with more focus and more concentration."

K-State's biggest assignment tonight will be halting the play of sophomore sensation Marvin Hill, who punished the Cats last year with 26 points and seven rebounds.

"They're big. They're not a little team by any means," Asbury said.

He said the Shockers play with great emotion, and said he hoped his team would match the Shockers high-energy level.

"We better match their emotion, because we haven't in the last two games," Asbury said. "We need to get much more consistent."

Asbury said head coach Randy Smithson is the right man for the coaching job because, he is familiar with the program at Wichita.

"He knows the ins and outs of that program more than anyone else, I can tell you that," he said.

Last year, Wichita State duked it out with the Cats before falling in defeat, 70-64. However, Asbury said this year's contest against the team would be much more difficult for the Cats.

"You cannot lose to a nonconference opponent," Asbury said. "If we lose because they're better, that's OK, but we better not lose because we didn't play well. There's no excuse for that."

FACED WITH THE block of K-State center Gerald Eaker, Morgan State forward Scott Deas changes his shot Saturday at Bramlage. Eaker tied his career high of four blocks in the 85-66 victory over the Bears.

Fast-paced band slows down on new album

MATT BASLER
staff reporter

Catherine Wheel's new album, "Like Cats and Dogs," is a variation of Catherine Wheel's unusual style of music.

The album consists of 12 B-sides that show a different side of the fast rock 'n' roll group.

If you don't know Catherine Wheel's music, the band could be described as a really hard Radiohead.

The album starts off with "Heal 2," which is a shorter version of the original "Heal" off the album "Happy Days."

This song is essentially the same as the first, but it has several small differences. Catherine Wheel obviously needed a shorter version to get some radio play out of this one.

After this first song, the album slips into a phase of slow songs that might surprise Catherine Wheel fans.

"Mouthful of air" is a good example of the album's slow side.

Although the first minute or so is good, it is indicative of the whole song, which seems to drag on forever after the first couple of minutes.

For those fans out there who enjoy Catherine Wheel's typical, fast-paced music, this area of the record might come as a shock, not because it is bad but because it shows a different side of the band. However, toward the end, songs such as "Tongue Twisted" bring back the old style of Catherine Wheel by going back and forth from slow to heavy with a hard climax in the middle.

For those fans looking for typical Catherine Wheel music, this is about as close as you will get on this album.

The song starts out with a funky use of phaser pedals and carries on with a fast, steady rhythm. This is definitely a song that defines the grunge side of Catherine Wheel.

Another song that moves and flows well on the album is "Harder Than I Am." Overall, this is the best song on the album.

This song has a catchy rhythm that carries the song from start to finish. It is the type of song you would hear in the morning and find yourself humming all day.

The best part of "Like Cats and Dogs" is Catherine Wheel's cover of Pink Floyd's "Wish You Were Here." The use of harmonica really makes this version stand out. The die-hard Catherine Wheel fan who enjoys this album but can't get enough needs only to wait several minutes after the last song.

ADRIAN FLEMING
Collegian

There are three hidden songs on the album in which the band seems to be screwing around.

Although they are fast and heavy, they don't have a whole lot of structure and flicker out with the rest of the album.

Catherine Wheel fans will appreciate this compact disc.

If you don't know or haven't heard of Catherine Wheel, buy the band's album "Happy Days" and get to know it first.

Prepare your body for cold

ASHLEY CELLER
staff reporter

The weather this year seemed to jump from summer to winter without allowing any time between for fall.

Now is the time to winterize yourself and prepare your body for the harsh effects of the winter months.

Cathie Barry, director of nursing for Lafene Health Center, said people are more susceptible to getting colds, influenza and mononucleosis during the winter.

These sicknesses are not a direct result of the cold weather but show up because of factors, Barry said.

"During the winter months, people spend a lot of time in closed buildings to keep out of the cold. However, the ventilation is not very good, because the windows aren't being opened, and organisms and bacteria are more confined," Barry said.

Infection is transmitted easily through the air in closed-up buildings, and when people don't wash their hands and transfer their germs to equipment and other people, infection spreads quickly, Barry said.

"I always get sick at the beginning of winter, so this year I went to Lafene and got a flu shot, because I don't have time to be sick. So far, it has worked, and now I'm going to get one every year at this time," Darren Holmes, senior in pre-medicine, said.

Flu shots are offered at Lafene in the Allergy Immunization Clinic every Thursday and will continue through January.

Barry said Lafene recommends flu shots to anyone who is 65 years old and older, anyone with a chronic disease or health problems and anyone who can't afford to get sick and take off time from work or school.

People can take steps to prevent sickness in these winter months, Barry said.

"It is important to get adequate rest, maintain a good diet with a lot of vitamin C, do not drink after other people, and most importantly, wash your hands frequently, especially if you suspect you're getting sick," she said.

Keeping healthy also includes dressing appropriately by wearing a lot of layers, keeping your head warm and covered, wearing a scarf around nose and mouth to make it easy to breathe and keeping your feet warm and dry, Barry said.

Sorority step team wins event, bounds into Sprite commercial

campus editor

Alpha Kappa Alpha women will be stomping into living rooms across the United States.

Members of the AKA step team won a Sprite TV commercial appearance at the Stomp-O-Rama step show Nov. 23 at the Black Kansas Expo in Kansas City, Mo.

The sorority won the commercial appearance along with $2,500 as a prize in the contest, said Daneeka Marshall, junior in radio/television and AKA reporter.

Jonita Woodson, senior in history and pre-law, said the sorority decided to compete in Stomp-O-Rama at the last minute.

She said they competed a week after they won the Neak Frasty step show at K-State. One of their sorority sisters who helped organize the expo asked them to come.

"I took them to pull our arms and legs," Woodson said.

Woodson said they were practicing in the locker room before the performance. She said they were worried their performance wouldn't come together, because they kept missing things in practice.

NEW LAW

from doctors who prescribe illegal drugs the registration license they need to prescribe controlled substances.

Law enforcement officials, including Richard Romley, county attorney in Maricopa County, Ariz., and Brad Gates, sheriff and coroner of Orange County, Calif., cited myriad problems the propositions are causing local law enforcement.

For example, should officers confiscate marijuana found in a car if a medical need is claimed? If the answer is yes, the officer might be liable for an illegal seizure. If no, the officer might be liable if the driver, high on the drugs, then gets into an accident.

Also, must officials provide drugs to inmates deemed to need them, and what will happen to anti-drug task forces that combine federal, state and local officers?

Romley and Gates urged the DEA to authorize local police to confiscate illegal drugs to eliminate liability issues for the local officers. Romley also urged the federal government to consider challenging the propositions in court.

Gates, meanwhile, urged the Justice Department to take smaller drug cases. In California's Central District, for example, the U.S. attorney now prosecutes only cases involving at least 200 kilos of marijuana or 200 plants, he said.

Hatch said the propositions passed because "philanthropists of the drug legalization movement pumped millions of dollars in out-of-state soft money into stealth campaigns designed to conceal their real objective — the legalization of drugs."

But support also came from such luminaries as former Reagan administration Secretary of State George Shultz; Nobel-laureate economist Milton Friedman; and former Sens. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., Alan Cranston, D-Calif., and Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz.

Marvin Cohen of Arizonans for Drug Policy Reform called it "absurd" to say "the voters of Arizona were somehow duped, duped into voting for something they didn't really understand."

Cohen said polling before the ads aired showed the public supported its provisions. Hatch said the questions never clarified that it covered heroin, LSD and methamphetamines.

by requiring one-third of classes to be above the 300 level.

And third, Royse said UGE will expand the concept of general education.

Now general education seems to be focused on arts and sciences, while with UGE, different colleges on campus will have classes available for anyone to take, not just majors of that college.

"This course has to be accessible to someone who is not a major, so that a non-major can benefit," Balk said.

Though UGE was approved by 70 percent of Faculty Senate, there are still some concerns about changing education at K-State.

"Anytime you propose a change, it will be hard anyway. Change is hard for all of us," Royse said.

Ken Shultis, professor of engineering, said he thinks UGE is a good idea, but he is still concerned that students can graduate on time.

"My concern is that students graduate in a timely fashion and get all the requirements," he said.

And although there are concerns about changing education, Nancy Goulden, co-chair of the general education task force and associate professor of speech, said UGE will improve education at K-State.

"I don't expect it to be a revolution in teaching here, but I think it's going to have a positive influence," she said.

explore the moon, colonize it or use it as a launch pad to explore other planets.

"You can use the moon as a gas station," he said. That saves the tremendous expense of transporting heavy water in space craft.

Clementine, launched January 1995, was a $75 million mission to test "Star Wars" sensors developed to detect and track missiles. The discovery of ice was an unexpected byproduct, Lehner said.

Because the moon has no atmosphere to trap gases and moisture, signs of ice there also could offer intriguing new clues about its origins more than 4 billion years ago.

Even after the mission detected the ice, scientists debated for months whether it was water or some other frozen liquid or gases. But Lehner said the "consensus" of scientific experts is that the pond is frozen water.

When told of the discovery, astronaut Thomas Jones, aboard the orbiting Columbia space shuttle, replied: "Sign me up for the prospecting trip."

"It was all worth it. We went through a lot," she said.

The AKAs competed against two other sororities. Crowd response determined the winner, Marshall said.

"They were yelling the loudest for us," she said.

The AKAs will appear in the commercial with the fraternity winner, Alpha Phi Alpha from Kansas City, Kan. They do not yet know when the commercial will be filmed or aired.

Marshall said half of the prize money was going to scholarships.

Woodson said they would use the money to give something back to the community. She said they were going to set up a mentoring and scholarship program for high-school seniors.

Marshall said many people describe stepping as a drill team, but it is not dancing, it is stomping and moving a lot.

"It takes a lot more energy and a lot more stamina. Routines last a while," she said.

Woodson said she had never been in something as big as a Sprite commercial.

"I'm pretty excited," she said.

Judge rules Hawaii must license gay marriages

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HONOLULU — A judge Tuesday barred Hawaii from denying marriage licenses to gay couples in a case that has already led Congress to allow other states to refuse to recognize such unions.

The ruling is certain to be appealed.

Kirk Cashmere, an attorney for three homosexual couples who sued the state, said Circuit Judge Kevin Chang ruled the sex-based classification in the state's marriage law is unconstitutional.

Chang said the state failed to show any compelling state interest to deny gay and lesbian couples the right to marry, Cashmere said.

Copies of Chang's ruling were to be distributed later Tuesday.

A spokeswoman for the conservative Family Research Council said the ruling defies the wishes of the majority: Polls said 70 percent of Hawaii's residents oppose same-sex marriages.

"This ruling is a slap in the face of the Hawaiian people who have made it clear that they don't want liberal judges tampering with society's foundational institutions," Kristi Stone Hamrick said.

Two gay men and two lesbian couples sued in 1991 for the right to marry, to the dismay of some national gay-rights organizations that felt the move was premature and would provoke a backlash.

It certainly prompted furious debate. In the state Legislature, lawmakers failed to agree this year on either a proposed constitutional amendment to ban them, or domestic partnership legislation giving gay and lesbian couples many of the legal and financial benefits of married couples.

Congress, meanwhile, approved a law President Clinton signed in September, saying the federal government will not recognize gay marriages and allowing states to refuse to recognize such marriages licensed in other states.

An appeal of Chang's ruling would send the case back to the Hawaii Supreme Court, which ruled in 1993 that denial of marriage licenses to same-sex couples amounted to gender discrimination under the state constitution's Equal Rights Amendment.

The state Supreme Court sent the case back to a lower court to give the state a chance to show a compelling public interest in allowing such discrimination.

In a two-week trial in September, Deputy State Attorney General Rick Eichor said Hawaii's marriage law is intended to promote the best environment for the procreation and rearing of children.

He said children thrive best when raised by biological parents and said legalizing same-sex marriages would open the door to demands that bigamy, polygamy and consensual incestuous relationships be licensed as well.

Both sides presented testimony from a parade of expert witnesses on family and child development, who gave conflicting opinions on whether gay couples could provide an equally nurturing environment.

After 40 years of discussion and an uphill battle in the U.S. Congress, the Tallgrass Prairie National Preserve is official.

BARBARA ZURHELLEN, director of the Tallgrass Prairie National Preserve, has seen the Z-Bar Ranch come from a local treasure to Kansas' first national park. Zurhellen began working at the ranch after the National Park Trust began developing support for it to be the cornerstone of a national park.

the prairie revival

STORY BY RUSSELL FORTMEYER • PHOTO BY DARREN WHITLEY

The Z-Bar Ranch, a sweeping historic ranch north of Strong City in the heart of the Flint Hills, is now the Tallgrass Prairie National Preserve, the only national park in the country singularly devoted to the preservation of the tallgrass prairie.

The preserve's staff celebrated President Clinton's signing last month of the legislation into law with an open house Sunday, attracting nearly 100 people out to brave the cold weather and melting snow.

Barbara Zurhellen, preserve director, said she hopes the recent political victories will calm fears from some area residents that a national park would be a detriment to local culture.

"It has helped turn around some of the opposition — maybe it didn't totally turn it around," Zurhellen said.

She said the preserve has always been controversial, because area landowners are fearful the park might wish to expand in the future, and it would attract rude people.

"On the other hand, there are people who think it will be wonderful for the community," she said. "You've got both sides, and it's been split for years."

Zurhellen has only worked at the preserve for two years, having, as she said, fallen into the job while she was an undergraduate in park resource management at K-State.

• The National Park Trust

Zurhellen does not work for the National Park Service; but for the National Park Trust. The trust is a private, not-for-profit organization that purchased the 10,894-acre Z-Bar Ranch in 1994 from a bank.

As part of the legislation, the trust will transfer 180 acres to the NPS for building a visitors' center and other amenities. The 180 acres also includes the historic house, barn and outbuildings of the ranch.

Peggy Marsh, project manager for the trust, said the preserve is unusual, because the trust acquired the entire park, whereas in most cases the trust acquires land within or near a national park to be sold at a later time to the NPS.

"Generally, the trust owns smaller amounts of land in and near parks that the National Park Service wanted to buy but couldn't in enough time," Marsh said.

In the case of the Z-Bar, the NPS studied the preserve in 1991 at the request of the Kansas congressional delegation.

Zurhellen said the preserve's main focus is a planning stage.

For the next three to five years, the NPS, in cooperation with the trust and local community members, will begin long-term planning,

Commission begins development discussion

JACQUELINE BONE
staff reporter

The Manhattan City Commission began discussion of a new housing development Tuesday night.

Commissioners debated the merits of annexing and rezoning Woodland Hills, a new housing development to be constructed near Stagg Hill Road.

This issue was tabled until the next meeting because of concerned residents living near the area who worry about driving safety due to steep roads, which would prevent access for school buses during winter.

Residents also voiced worries about decreased property values.

The development would create 104 new single-family homes. Commission members, as well as planners and builders, said Manhattan desperately needs new affordable housing.

The commission moved on to approve the first reading of a charter ordinance regarding the storm-water management plan.

This plan would charge fees to property owners in proportion to the amount of water runoff they contribute.

For example, a parking lot would contribute more water runoff than a grassy area of the same size, so the parking lot would be charged more.

A fee of $1.28 would be assessed to single-family living units as of July 1. Other properties would be charged according to square footage.

The money created as a result of these fees would go to construct necessary storm-water facilities, to maintain facilities so they will operate for a longer period of time and to improve existing storm-drainage channels to minimize erosion.

Also on the commission's agenda was the new chimpanzee exhibit to be constructed at Sunset Zoological Park.

"We've been working on this a long time," Mayor Sydney Carlin said.

The chimp exhibit has been in the works since 1989. The project will upgrade the current exhibit, giving the • PARIS BOMB KILLS TWO. A bomb tore apart a packed subway car in the heart of Paris on Tuesday, killing two people and wounding dozens. The bomb was fashioned from a 28-pound gas canister. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the rush-hour bombing. It happened at 6:05 p.m. at the Port-Royal station near the Eiffel Tower and the Notre Dame Cathedral.

• YUGOSLAVIAN RADIO STATIONS SHUT DOWN. Authorities muzzled two independent radio stations Tuesday and lashed out fiercely at the growing opposition to Slobodan Milosevic, even as more than 100,000 protesters rallied against the Serbian president and sharpened their demands. Demonstrators hurled snowballs at the state-run media buildings in the 15th-straight day of protests against Milosevic and his decision to annul Nov. 17 local elections that appeared to have been won by the opposition. Police still kept their distance, but one report said reserve police officers were being mobilized nationwide.

• U.S. BARS FIRST JAPANESE VETERANS IN WORLD WAR II CRIMES. After tracking Nazi war criminals for 17 years, the Justice Department took its first action Tuesday against Japanese army veterans suspected of medically experimenting on prisoners and operating forced sex camps during World War II. Sixteen men who served in the Imperial Army were barred from ever entering the United States. They were the first Japanese placed on the government's watch list since it was established in 1979 to keep out people who engaged in persecution on behalf of Nazi Germany or its allies.

More than 60,000 people linked to Nazi persecution in Europe have been put on the list since 1979, including former United Nations Secretary-General and Austrian President Kurt Waldheim. The list has prevented more than 100 people from entering since 1989, when record keeping began.

• COMPUTER FAILURE DELAYS LAUNCH OF MARS PROBE. A last-minute computer failure delayed NASA's launch early today of a Mars spacecraft carrying the first-ever interplanetary rover. Unlike the day before when rain and strong wind forced a scrub, the weather was near-perfect Tuesday for the liftoff of Mars Pathfinder. But a computer on the ground failed with just a little more than a minute remaining in the countdown. A backup computer also would not work, leading officials to suspect a software problem. After the problem was resolved, the launch was rescheduled for early today.

• VOLCANO ERUPTS IN NEW GUINEA. A volcanic eruption on an island off the north coast of Papua, New Guinea, on Tuesday sent lava gushing into valleys and forced officials to move scores of families to safer ground.

The afternoon eruption spewed ash up to 20,000 feet into the air, blanketing Manam Island, said Leith Anderson, director general of National Disaster and Emergency Services.

Hundreds of villagers were relocated from the northern part of the island to the southern side, and emergency crews in Papua New Guinea were on standby to evacuate the island's 7,000 villagers if necessary, he said. There were unconfirmed reports that two people had died.

• GIRARDI STAYS WITH NEW YORK YANKEES. Catcher Joe Girardi opted to stay with the New York Yankees, agreeing Tuesday to a $5.5 million, two-year contract. Girardi, 32, hit .294 in his first season with the Yankees with two homers and 45 RBIs and 13 steals, the most by a catcher in the major leagues last season. With 25 players left to sign, New York is less than $4 million under the $51 million threshold for a luxury tax next year.

• LEON LETT SUSPENDED FOR ONE YEAR. Dallas Cowboys defensive tackle Leon Lett was suspended a minimum of one year — effective immediately — by the NFL on Tuesday for violating the league's drug policy. The 28-year-old Lett is the second high-profile Cowboy to receive a drug-related suspension this season.

According to the NFL's substance policy, a suspended player may not participate with his team in any way during the time he is out. A player suspended for one year may apply for reinstatement no sooner than 60 days prior to the one-year anniversary date of his suspension.

ROBBERY

staff writer

Three people were kept at gunpoint Monday at the Evergreen Apartment Complex at 1100 Gardenway.

According to the Riley County Police Department, at 3 p.m. an unknown male entered the office of the apartment complex with a handgun and demanded cash. After receiving an undetermined amount of checks and cash, he fled the area on foot.

There was no harm done to the three people in the office, and the perpetrator is still at large, police said.

He was described as wearing a gray, cotton-style sweat suit and a dark blue ski mask.

This act has not been part of a trend around the area or in Manhattan, according to RCPD.

"This has been the first time we have had an armed robbery in a long time," RCPD Sgt. Joe Stech said.

The robbery is still being investigated by the RCPD.

The smell of leather hangs in the air. Riders lug halters and heavy saddles to their mounts as the horses whinny in anticipation.

This is no ordinary class at K-State. Horse lovers jump at the chance to enroll in Randel Raub's horse-training management classes every semester.

"You don't need a lot of experience, and you learn a lot about horses and handling them," Raub said.

During the first few days of class, Raub evaluates the students and places them in categories based on their experience with handling horses. Some students will ground train a horse and others will train a horse under saddle.

Ground training refers to teaching the horse how to accept a halter, learning how to walk forward with people, and learning how to accept people.

Training a horse under saddle requires a little more patience. Students teach the horse how to accept a saddle, learn to walk forward and backward, and accept a rider.

The horses come from people in the state who allow them to be used in the class. The owners then pick up the horses either in December when the first class is over or in the spring. Other horses are bred at the K-State horse unit.

"Most really enjoy the opportunity and experience, but there is never enough time to ride," Raub said.

Although the students do have fun with the horses, the usual tests go along with the class. Raub said it was difficult to grade the students, because they all have different abilities, and because of their horses' attitudes on a particular day.

"I really do like the program," J.D. Weber, senior in animal sciences and industry, said. "I have a sense of accomplishment when my horse does something right."

Weber said it's difficult to learn how to train a horse. A student has to learn to sense and feel how the horse is getting along.

"Each horse has its own personality," Weber said. "Mine has an attitude that tries you. He is also more bucky than usual. I am learning to let him move at his own pace and teaching him to trust me."

Weber said he will put in about 100 hours on horseback this semester in training.

Not only do the horses learn from the riders, but the riders learn from their mounts as well.

"The greatest thing I've learned is about myself," Weber said. "I've learned what my training style is, and my horse has taught me patience."

Another student, Joey Willhite, senior in animal sciences and industry, said she has the same sentiments.

"The greatest benefit is that I've learned there is more than one way to work with a horse. You learn these ways and then add them to your experience," Willhite said.

Willhite trains a 4-year-old gelding under saddle and said she is working on his skittishness and teaching him how to trust people. She said they have been making progress, and he has a lot of potential.

"My colt is a natural athlete," Willhite said. "His natural inclination is to pivot his back end when I turn him and when I ask for a stop, he rounds his rump a little and complies."

After the fall and spring training classes come to an end, some of the horses are sold at the annual K-State consignment sale in March.

"All this hard work is to see if we can show off the horses' talents in the show ring during the sale and get the best price for them," Willhite said.

Raub said he knows how much work his students put into their mounts every week.

"It's really my favorite class. It's the ultimate communications course between the horse and rider. I really enjoy watching the students teach the horses and watching the horses teach the students," Raub said.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Z-Bar Ranch will be beneficial to state culture and finances

Kansas has joined a select number of states in possessing a national park with the creation of the Tallgrass Prairie National Preserve.

Passed by Congress and signed into law by President Clinton, the former Z-Bar Ranch north of Strong City in the heart of the Flint Hills will forever be preserved as the singular national park devoted to the prairie ecosystem.

WHY WE CARE

Kansas' first national park will give our state pride and an ecological heritage and add to our tourism industry.

This is an exciting time to be a Kansan.

Unlike K-State's own Konza Prairie, which is used predominantly for research, the Tallgrass Preserve will be accessible to the public. In the next few years, the National Park Service will develop the preserve into a working park, complete with public amenities that have yet to be announced.

It is possible one would have the opportunity to camp, bike, ride horses, hike or enjoy a nature-interpretive center — not to mention the other regional cultural resources.

The preserve will no doubt increase the tourism revenues of Kansas while creating a more widespread respect for the native Kansas prairie as a valid ecosystem on par with those in other national parks.

Responsibilities come with the respect and benefits of a national park.

The National Park Trust and the NPS have a responsibility to area landowners and citizens to respect their points of view.

One of the big controversies surrounding the preserve was government ownership of land and whether or not the preserve would expand in the future.

The trust has said it does not wish to expand the preserve.

The legislation does not allow the NPS to acquire more than 180 acres of the existing preserve, which will be used for the public amenities.

The trust and the NPS have entered a planning period. Area citizens should be invited to the table to help develop what will surely become an environmental treasure for Kansas.

Kansans should be proud of the people who have worked to make this park a reality and proud of the prairie ecosystem that the preserve celebrates.

Wealth and worth do not coincide

"White Trash Party," the fliers read.

It appeared months ago, among the usual trail of fliers gracing the newsroom walls, and I was uncharacteristically speechless.

Since then every column has invited an opportunity to challenge the stereotypes of class that I have put off.

It made tangible the unspoken assumption I've experienced in the academic climate that students are middle- to upper-class, the underlying implication is that we don't belong here. (Not to neglect or minimize the racist implications of the term.)

Did they not know that white trash was among them, contaminating the very newsroom where their fliers were innocently posted?

Class is defined by Webster's dictionary as "a social stratum whose members share similar political, economic and cultural characteristics." This definition recognizes class as beyond income, but the culture of class is generally denied or diminished among the underclasses to diffuse solidarity and disempower us, to keep us in our place by isolating us from even each other.

Class is restricted to an issue strictly about money except when that distinction challenges the efficiency and humanity of capitalism, and then it resumes its real meaning.

By definition, class is a social rank, not an economic rank.

Money is a secondary aspect of class seen as a manifestation or reward for having class.

The implications of class are that it is about quality, grade, style or excellence. It's not a cultural distinction resulting from an economic variable, but a division between the superior who have class and are visible and those who are classless, and therefore invisible.

It amazes me how defensive some middle-class people seem of their economic privilege, but it shouldn't surprise me.

In such a competitive society, exposing the middle class to someone more vulnerable on the economic food chain carries a lot of guilt with it.

I recognize this guilt because of the guilt I feel for my white privilege or when I face someone even more vulnerable.

Those I've met who consider themselves middle-class seem reluctant to identify their class privilege and usually emphasize that they are lower-middle-class, which from my perspective negates the meaning of middle-class.

There seems to be a tendency of those benefiting from the system to downplay their power in order to justify or protect it.

As a result, the meanings of middle-class, of poor, of working-class have been diluted to enable the perpetuation of classism.

As the class spectrum becomes more concentrated between rich and poor and there is less room for a middle class, the trend seems to be to maintain a middle-class status by denying it. Meanwhile, those who actually are lower-class are pressured to minimize our struggles.

A mythical link remains between wealth and worth that minimizes the responsibility of the system for the collective monetary assault that renders a fraction of the population disposable. This is often disguised as the so-called work ethic.

Given the homicidal nature of capitalism, to think in terms of the numbers of the casualties of poverty and those living on the outskirts of poverty, this structure is not just homicidal, but genocidal.

To acknowledge the culture of class and recognize the lethal effect of American capitalism, there exists no less than a "systematic, planned annihilation of a racial, political and/or cultural group," the definition of genocide.

There is a frustration among those who manage to penetrate the class barrier and infiltrate into a class of the visible, only to be told that it is because we are different, that we are better than what/who we came from, and that we are stronger because of the so-called challenges we've faced.

To be told that our abuse and the suffering that was imposed by and perpetuated by capitalism and patriarchy's corrupt distribution of power and resources is a challenge. This is a slap in the face.

This is both a brutal insult and an attempt to fictionalize our pain as a story of the martyr who overcame her odds because of her strength rather than the truth.

The truth is that a percentage of the neglected classes must be allowed to make it in order to convince those still seduced by the concept of democracy that all people do have a chance if they take the initiative.

The truth is that the one out of a hundred, (or a thousand) who make it are used by those who benefit from economic inequality to shame those who don't make it into believing that those of us who come from the same place, but make it, have some strength or morality that they lack.

The truth is that we do not. There is no difference between unwarranted wealth and unwarranted poverty, except that someone must be blamed for poverty.

No one wants to believe that the government that is supposed to protect us and to make all things fair, depends on an expendable class, and it is nothing personal.

It is capitalism, not a genetic survival of the fittest implying the capacity for dedication and hard work, but survival of the economically fittest, determined by both a social and financial inheritance with the power to make or break you before you even enter the world.

No amount of money or success will rob me of my identification as white trash.

I will wear that label to make people uncomfortable, and to challenge the stereotypes, not allowing witnesses to call me an exception to the stereotypes.

My role serves as one of few systematic exceptions used to shame the members of my class into believing that they lack something for not being able to penetrate the class barrier.

My role benefits the system as it benefits me, granting me opportunities normally denied to my class. To fail to acknowledge this would be a betrayal of my class.

Football team and its fans pathetic at big games

Editor,

Considering the annual rise and thud of the K-State football team and all the hype that goes with it, its experience can be likened to a naive FFA member who gathers his egg money for a trip to the big city, gets stupid drunk, endures a painful hangover, and sheepishly scurries back to the farm with his tail tucked between his legs.

Such a scenario not only has become one of the most predictable, but it is also the most entertaining sports spectacle here in Big 12 country.

It happens each year about this time when K-State gets thrashed by a legitimate football power with something at stake.

It is especially entertaining remembering how arrogant the K-State fans had been while their team rolled over the patsy opponents they always schedule.

Such blowout wins provide these people with an exhilaration similar to ones they get when watching a good broadleaf herbicide in action.

However, when the true contenders come calling the Mildcats and their fans fold up like a cheap pole barn and realize that "Bill" ball, and the high rankings have been nothing more than hype.

It is at this time that they acknowledge the time has come to once again board their tractors, lift the plows and leave the upper echelon of the Big 12 to those who can handle it.

Too often the built environments that should comfort us become places that confuse, dismay and frustrate.

This phenomenon realizes itself to the fullest at Christmastime, when our businesses, main streets and homes are decorated in the joyous, plasticized spirit of the season.

Whereas our home decorations are more or less part of a tradition or religious ritual, those of the public domain are meant to encourage purchases or transactions by attracting attention — a sort of visual identity screaming "We sell Christmas gifts you want to buy."

This decoration, both public and private, contributes to a feeling of sensory overload. A person is attacked by the sights of excessive decoration, the tastes and smells of holiday baking, the sounds of carols, the touch of gifts, and, to coin a sixth sense, hit pretty hard in the old wallet.

If sensory overload eludes you, odds are you haven't ventured into our Wal-Mart lately, complete with the tantalizing aroma of hot apple pie pockets baking in McDonald's.

Aisle upon aisle is stacked 12-feet high with every conceivable Christmas gift, both practical and foolish, cheap and sturdy.

As if this were not enough, the open space that exists in the store for secondary concerns like, oh, carts and people, has been reduced further to accommodate displays of special items you might have no inclination to purchase otherwise.

Unfortunately, this condition does not weaken once one arrives at the rows of cash registers with the intent on leaving. For surrounding the so-called check-out lanes are walls of last-minute purchase items. But I ask how many times you've accidentally forgotten to purchase a 10-gallon ice chest?

For better or worse, all retail outlets suffer this fate, only a store such as Dillard's adds some tasteful plants and superficial eye candy to tone the confrontation down.

The basic idea is to place as many items in your range of view to make as many sales as possible before Dec. 25.

A few stores prescribe to a minimalist attitude with little decoration and little signage. If you find one in Kansas, could you call me?

Seriously, the smaller stores of Aggieville and downtown don't suffer Wal-Mart's fate due mostly to size. A store like Streetside Records is comfortably busy visually. Its large array of merchandise is arranged to lead one's eye, not confront it.

> "If sensory overload eludes you, odds are you haven't ventured into our Wal-Mart lately, complete with the tantalizing aroma of hot apple pie pockets baking in McDonald's."

Wal-Mart is simply Streetside multiplied by 20, where one's eye tires of the endless aisles of merchandise.

On campus, this visual attack has manifested outdoors recently in the garishly sick orange fluorescent signs distinguishing reserved parking stalls.

Thanks to Parking Services, a walk through campus isn't an enjoyable trek through a garden, but almost visually upsetting as the unnatural orange square targets invade your visual spectrum.

What are the motivations here? To spend more student money pandering to the automobile culture that already runs this campus by making the signs more readable from a car at the expense of pedestrians?

Conversely, there are times when a full-throttle attack on the senses makes sense, so to speak.

Would New York City's Times Square be quite the same place if it were not for the deluge of neon and gimmickry overwhelming the pedestrian?

But one goes there expecting, almost craving, this very thing.

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

It makes no sense for a trip to a commercial outlet to purchase toilet paper to conjure a similar response (minus the winos and fake watch salesclerks).

As Christmas passes and decorations are put away, our environments become less cluttered gaining a clean and simple appearance — as if there were less there than before the holiday season.

The paradox is the new simplicity is freshly comforting and, in its sense of loss, distressful. One feels something is missing, and yet one misses nothing.

Without degenerating into an attack on shopping or Christmas, I must ask if there is a possibility of celebrating Christmas, or whatever highly commercial holiday you wish to consider, in a minimalist milieu with simplicity, grace and dignity?

With giant retailers like Wal-Mart, thriving off revenues with little inclination to create interesting commercial spaces, setting market trends the answer to our sad question is obvious.

Air Force workers accused of harassment

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN ANTONIO — The Air Force is proposing disciplinary action for civilian workers accused of racially harassing two black aircraft mechanics at Kelly Air Force Base, military officials said Tuesday.

Among other complaints, the mechanics at the reservist 433rd Airlift Wing said they were taunted by co-workers who rode in a government van and wore pillowcases that resembled Ku Klux Klan hoods.

"We are treating this as a serious incident," Kelly public affairs director Glen Whiton said Tuesday.

Kevin Harris and Phil Head, civilian mechanics with reserve status, said Monday they filed administrative complaints with the Air Force after the Sept. 16 episode. Both said it was not the first time they endured racial harassment at the San Antonio base.

Harris and Head are on administrative leave.

Whiton's statement said attorneys have met to discuss resolving the complaint, and appropriate disciplinary action has been proposed for the individuals responsible.

Base officials would not identify the workers or elaborate on the possible punishment. James Myart, a lawyer representing Harris and Head, said they are oceans apart in settling the complaint. Myart declined to discuss any monetary damages his clients are seeking.

Shockers stun Cats behind arc

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

The Wichita State Shockers handed the Wildcats their first loss of the season Tuesday night at Bramlage Coliseum with a 74-59 loss that left the Cats in a stupor.

The Wildcats held the Shockers scoreless in the first four minutes of the game and led 9-7, but things soon changed down the stretch.

With the score knotted at 15 each at the midway point of the first half, the Cats went into their zone defense to stop the inside threat of the Shockers, but that left the shot open.

"We knew we had to slow down and get some rhythm," Wichita State coach Randy Smithson said. "We slowed down and paced our offense, and we were real good."

The Shockers were just hanging around in the first half, waiting for a spark to shoot into their offense.

The Cats were well in control most of the first half and led 22-17 with four minutes and 51 seconds left.

But enter the three-point bucket.

The Shockers stunned K-State and the rest of the fans as they outscored the Cats 11-4 in the final 4:51 in the half and took a 28-26 lead into halftime. Their run was produced by three three-pointers.

Coach Tom Asbury said K-State's offense was lacking in the first half, but the Shockers put a damper on K-State's spirits with a crucial spurt to end the first frame.

"I didn't fault our effort at all," Asbury said. "We were out of sync offensively."

The problem in the second half for the Cats was they couldn't seem to find a sync to get into, but rather scored in spurts.

K-State opened the second half with three quick fouls — three quick fouls that put center Gerald Eaker on the bench with 17:01 left in the contest.

"Our big guys learned they needed to fight on the big post players," Smithson said.

Without Eaker, the Cats were still on top 31-29. Wichita State's first field goal came five minutes and 25 seconds into the second frame, but just when it looked as if the Cats were going to run away, Wichita's shooters showed up.

K-State's post-play lacking in loss to Wichita State

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

Going into the K-State-Wichita State game, it seemed the Cats' game plan would be to get the ball inside. The Cats' big men were bigger and stronger than those of the Shockers.

Freshman Darrin Williams and senior Jamie Arnold was the Shockers' tallest starters at 6'8". Cat center Gerald Eaker (6'11"), forward Shawn Rhodes (6'11") and forward Manny Dies (6'9") had an obvious size advantage.

But the Cats couldn't take advantage of the mismatch, falling to the Shockers 74-59 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Against Morgan State, the Cats had the same-size advantage. Eaker took advantage of it, scoring a career-high 22 points.

But Tuesday night was a different story for Eaker against the Shockers. The senior finished the night with zero points, only took one shot and didn't grab a single offensive rebound.

"They really focused on taking Eaker out of the game," Coach Tom Asbury said. "They did it, and he just never got in sync."

Bothered by foul trouble all evening, Eaker never found his groove. At the 18:02 mark of the second half, Eaker received his fourth foul. Then, with more than 10 minutes left in the game and the Cats down three, Eaker received his fifth foul.

But could the Shockers really have imagined Eaker would have finished the evening

NCAA Tourney kicks off tonight

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

Tonight the K-State volleyball team will take on another first in a season that has been full of them.

The Wildcats will play host to their first-ever NCAA Tournament appearance against Cal State-Northridge in Ahearn Field House at 7:30 tonight. Tickets are $5 for adults and $3 for students with a student ID.

K-State is hoping to pack Ahearn to help put pressure on the Matadors.

"Northridge, according to their media release, has not played in front of more than a thousand people this season," Moore said. "If we can put 3,000 or 4,000 people in Ahearn, there's a possibility that that could really intimidate them."

Cal-State Northridge comes into tonight's game with a 22-10 overall record including a 16-0 record in the Big Sky Conference. The Wildcats finished the season 25-8 and 13-7 in conference play to tie for fourth with Colorado.

K-State received the tournament announcement on Sunday night in the confines of the volleyball office, where the whole team had gathered. Once the announcement was made the team showed a business-like response.

"I was pleased with how we reacted," Moore said. "They (the players) reacted the same way I did. There was no fake emotion, jumping up and down. It was like we were saying to ourselves, 'Now we're here. Let's do what we came to do.'

"I know we are not just happy to be here," he said. "They want to move on in this. That's easier said than done, but we are not just happy to be here."

Northridge is led be Getty Dimitrova with 531 kills in 1,158 attempts. Heather Hofmans has 1,168 assists, while Nancy Ma has 439 digs to help lead the Matadors.

An appearance in the NCAA Tournament is just another step in the turnaround of K-State volleyball, which Jim Moore began to engineer in his first season at the helm in 1994. Prior to Moore's arrival, K-State had suffered through five consecutive losing seasons.

Moore said the biggest thing he has tried to do as coach is give his team confidence.

"I think we were OK physically when I came here," Moore said. "The biggest part of coaching is to get the players to feel good about themselves. I hope they feel better about themselves than they did three years ago. We have a lot of confidence now."

The winner of tonight's game will go on in the second round of the tournament to face Washington State, 25-5, who plays host to the game at 1 p.m. Sunday.

Whatever it takes, you've got to have heart

Two nights ago against the Utah Jazz, Hersey Hawkins scored the 7 millionth point in NBA history, but the Seattle Supersonics lost the game.

A few nights earlier the invincible Michael "Air" Jordan became the second-fastest player in history to score 25,000 points in his NBA career.

Sure, these are two pretty amazing feats, but these accomplishments tell nothing about the people themselves.

Jordan is probably the greatest player to ever walk on the planet: four world championships, who knows how many MVP awards, scoring titles out the gazoo, and now he has his own cologne.

MY

Jeremy KELLEY

Who really cares? These accolades and awards the aforementioned players have accomplished tell nothing of their hearts.

You see, I have what most people call a predilection for heart.

I love when athletes put aside all other distractions when competing and play with their hearts and nothing but their hearts. Forget showboating, because it won't make a champion. Forget selfishness, because it won't produce a hero. Forget talking trash, because no matter how much you talk, you'll never win. You have to turn to the heart.

What motivates athletes to perform with their heart? It for sure isn't any type of extrinsic motivation, but rather intrinsic. I am fully convinced that when you play with heart, you can and will achieve anything and everything you want.

Sure, you may not win at everything, but you will feel better about yourself in the end. When you play with heart you'll never have room to make excuses about what you should have done or what you could have done differently. If you play with heart you'll never want to give up when you're down.

Two classic examples of athletes who play with heart here at K-State are Aaron Swartzendruber and Kjersten Larson.

Swartzendruber is not a real big guy, but he does have a real big heart. In last Saturday's game he had 19 points, five assists, two steals and most importantly nine rebounds. NINE!

Super-center Gerald Eaker only had seven, and he is seven inches taller than Swartzendruber. After the Morgan State game, I had a talk with Swartzendruber about what drives him to play so hard during a game. His response was an ideal response from a person who has heart, "The bottom line is that I want to win. I'll do whatever it takes to win."

The operative word in that response is whatever. If Coach Tom Asbury wants him to get rebounds to win, he'll do whatever it takes. If Asbury wants him to get steals, he'll do whatever it takes. Whatever it takes, he'll always have heart.

Larson is not a superstar by any means, but she's got it, too. This past weekend was the first time I watched the women's team this season. But let me tell you, I was impressed with this young woman. Larson's not a big scorer either, but she plays her heart out. She plays with everything inside of herself, and when she is on the court she doesn't quit. The gal has got heart.

Of course the perfect example of a team coming together and achieving a feat like no other team would have to be the New York Yankees. Albeit they were on top of the AL East division for a good part of the year, but when the playoffs rolled around they showed what they were made of.

In the first two games of the World Series, the Yanks were annihilated by what everyone thought was the team of the 1990s — the Atlanta Braves. The Yanks were smoked in the first game 12-1. OUCH!

Down, but definitely not out, Yankee manager Joe Torre assured owner George Steinbrenner that they would go to Atlanta and sweep the Braves and come back to New York and win the series in game six. Sure enough, the Yanks pulled it off.

They put all egos aside and pulled together as a team and won the World Series. Granted the Yankees have some go-to players, but nobody who was consistent for them throughout the playoffs. It was team effort, and it was truly an effort of heart.

Just remember the inspirational words of the boss, "I've always said that if you wait and keep your mouth shut, things will come around right." Nobody really knows what that means, but in my opinion it was Steinbrenner's heart talking, not his mouth.

Band has powerful lyrics, balance in premier release

On the Web

The Electronic Collegian features sound clips off of Chalk FarM's first compact disc, "Notwithstanding." Check out the E-Collegian at (http://collegian.ksu.edu).

ANDREW FRANCIS
staff reporter

The young band Chalk FarM relies on driving music that utilizes powerful lyrics and musical balance to create an original sound in the heavily populated genre of alternative-rock music.

When popular new bands arrive on the scene, many music listeners toss aside their old compact discs and adopt the latest band that has become the new sensation. It may be difficult to think of music as an investment, but Chalk FarM's first album, "Notwithstanding," delivers the punch to give rock enthusiasts their money's worth.

Chalk FarM began as a duo with Michael Duff, guitarist, and Orlando Sims, bassist, both as vocalists. Duff and Sims borrowed a friend from another band to play drums until they found drummer Toby Scarbrough.The band played sets as an acoustic trio until it realized it needed to expand its sound. Chalk FarM then added guitarist Trace Ritter to the band. It played its first show as a four-piece on Feb. 12, 1995, and signed with Columbia Records in December 1995.

"Live tomorrow," the first song on the album, begins with a medium-paced tempo that is prepared to pick up the pace and take off. The song introduces the band's interest in composing meaningful music. The lyrics combine introspective thoughts and show the band's ability to communicate interesting lyrics.

"I don't think it's wise to be idle when you're young. Oh, I have to go. I'll have time to live tomorrow," Duff sings.

"Live tomorrow" tells the typical story of a person going nowhere quickly, doing all that is possible to tread water in the deep end of life. The idea behind the song may be an over-used cliché in songwriting, but Chalk FarM's musical talent makes the cliché seem nonexistent.

Each song on the album has its own personality, which adds variety to the album. The variety makes listening to "Notwithstanding" in its entirety easy to do. But some songs may tempt a listener to hit the rewind button.

"It's up to you" is a slow song that reveals Chalk FarM's acoustical talents. Meaningful lyrics give the song an emotional feeling that can capture an attentive listener. The song is softened with a subtle accordion accompaniment by Rami Jaffee of the Wallflowers. A violin solo by guest artist Calabria McChesney is perfectly arranged into the song.

According to Chalk FarM's World Wide Web site, the capital M in Chalk FarM has no hidden meaning. The band members said they liked the way it looked, because it seemed balanced.

The title of the album, "Notwithstanding," represents all the times the word appeared in their contract when they signed with Columbia Records.

Notwithstanding its quick success, Chalk FarM has the talent to deliver quality music for years to come.

'First Contact' new hope for the future of Star Trek

CHRIS DEAN
staff reporter

Forget the characters you knew. Forget the show you watched every Saturday. Resistance is futile. "Star Trek: The Next Generation" has been assimilated.

"Star Trek: First Contact," the eighth in the feature-film series, opened Nov. 22 with a new ship, recreated characters and a new hope for Star Trek movies.

After "Generations," the idea of another feature film had Star Trek fans everywhere looking for someplace to hide.

But with the Borg, time travel and the absence of James T. Kirk, the producers of "First Contact" have struck gold.

"First Contact" has placed the action back in the movie theater and keeps you on the edge of your seat from the opening sequence until the last scene.

The premise of the movie is that the Borg have decided to assimilate Earth the easy way.

They will take it during the 21st century instead of the 25th. Picard and his crew manage to follow the Borg ship back in time and destroy it, but not before the Borg set up their own nest on the Enterprise-E. The Enterprise crew has to save itself and the future of Star Fleet.

Besides featuring a captain who can act, this movie does something no other film has been able to pull off.

It has completely changed the personalities of the characters who existed on television and even altered Star Fleet history, yet the movie remains believable and exciting.

Data falls in love with a Borg and loses control of his emotions. Picard becomes irrational and puts on a scene that would make Shakespeare cheer, and it is not Dr. Crusher who talks him down this time.

Troi looks and acts more like a Las Vegas lounge singer than a ship's counselor. Riker doesn't take command of the situation and save the day, on screen at least. (Jonathan Frakes directs "First Contact.") Even Worf seems to have a change of personality as he argues against staying and fighting the Borg.

Every Trek has its flaws, though. "Generations," for example, was a flaw in and of itself. In "First Contact," the remaining questions are enough to baffle Gene Rodenberry.

How does Worf survive decompression after his space suit is ripped open by a Borg? How did the crew get back to its own time? When did a plasma coolant leak become an easy cleanup job? What is "Deep Space Nine" going to do now that Worf destroyed the Defiant?

The movie moves fast enough with action, though, that these questions are quickly ignored.

"First Contact" is not only the best Star Trek movie, but it is also a great science-fiction movie and will easily take its place as one of the classics.

she said.

"The Park Service doesn't want day-to-day responsibilities at first," Zurhellen said. "I will act as the liaison person for the trust."

The preserve is mainly open for tours of the buildings and a short prairie walk to a historic schoolhouse because much of the land is leased for cattle grazing. Whether such amenities as camping, horseback riding, biking or walking will be allowed in the majority of the acreage depends on the outcome of the planning period.

Zurhellen said the trust plans to kick off a fundraising campaign in early 1997 to pay off the mortgage and set up an endowment.

Because the preserve only became a national park less than a month ago, most of the planning is still in the talking phase.

Marsh said the role of the trust remains unclear, because the way in which the preserve was created is different.

"It's very unique," Marsh said. "The trust is a long-term partner with the Park Service."

Marsh said a partnership proposal by the NPS and the trust should be done as early as spring 1997.

"It's such a new approach to parks that a lot of this remains to be seen."

• The National Park Service

The creation of one more national park will call for the need to expand the NPS, which has experienced funding and operational problems in the past.

Elaine Sevy, spokeswoman for the NPS, said there were no concessions made for the addition of the preserve to the national park system in the 1996 appropriations bill because it passed before the parks bill.

"It will take a couple of years to need funding to get the parks up and running," Sevy said. "This is not a problem for us, but we do need some money for the planning."

Sevy said a supplemental funding request will go to Congress for planning money.

When Medicare, welfare and defense increasingly eat up the federal budget, creating a national park might seem a luxury the country can't afford.

"It's tough," Sevy said. "You can't say because our country has a budget deficit we can't add sites to the system."

Sevy said the NPS's senior staffers welcomed the preserve into the system and think it more than deserves to be a national park.

The overall budget for the NPS was increased 3 percent this year, with some pointed increases in specific programs, she said.

"We're not out of the woods, yet," Sevy said. "We're in a little better shape this year than we have been."

• The Legislative Process

The seeds of the preserve go back 40 years with, literally, a grassroots campaign to create a national park in Kansas.

This push for a park was met with opposition complete with roadside signs along Kansas Highway 177 proclaiming "Keep our grasslands free" — a response to the idea of the government 'sseizing the land under imminent domain. Although the park was acquired privately, the signs are still planted as a reminder of the opposition that still exists.

However, it wasn't until Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., became actively involved in the process after her election to the U.S. Senate in 1978 that the park began to evolve into a possibility. Kassebaum's family farm near Council Grove neighbors the preserve.

Although Kassebaum worked in the Senate to seek passage of legislation, then-Rep. Dan Glickman, now Secretary of Agriculture, worked to pass the legislation in the House. After the redistricting of Kansas, the preserve fell out of Glickman's district and into Rep. Pat Roberts', R-Kan., who recently won election to the Senate.

After considering the legislation in session after session, the preserve was brought up for one last try in 1996 as part of the Omnibus Parks and Public Lands Act, which passed as one of the last pieces of legislation considered by the 104th Congress.

This was Kassebaum's final attempt at gaining passage before leaving the Senate, because she did not seek re-election this year.

"It was an important step forward," Dave Bartel, Kassebaum's chief of staff, said. "It required a lot of negotiating and talking over a whole range of issues with agriculture and conservation groups and finding a balance.

"She's very pleased with this, and she wants to know what she can do to help with the planning."

Bartel said there is a possibility of Kassebaum's serving on the board of directors of the preserve, but no matter what the outcome, she plans to be involved in some capacity.

Although the entire Kansas delegation to the House and Senate voted in favor of the preserve, neither Sam Brownback, R-Kan., nor Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., publicly supported it.

Dave Hanna, communications director for Tiahrt, said Tiahrt's position was that although he would not support the preserve legislation, he would not stand in its way.

"We're not taking adequate care of the parks we do own," Hanna said. "Many of our major parks are not in good condition, and we did not want to add another park to the system."

Hanna said Tiahrt recognized that Kassebaum and Roberts had worked hard to create the park, and he did not want to fuel an opposition.

• The K-State Connection

Although the preserve is an hour's drive away, in Chase County, K-State has many direct connections.

Karissa Lundgrin and Marlana Hodgkinson, seniors in park resource management, work at the preserve as an intern and a volunteer, respectively.

Iralee Barnard, a botanist at the K-State herbarium, has spent the past two years working on a plant survey of the preserve.

"It's diverse with many different habitats," Barnard said. "That makes the plants more diverse."

Barnard said there were nearly 400 types of plants on the preserve, but there could be more because the survey project is not finished.

Although Barnard said she will continue her survey project, she said she would be glad to help with the planning of the preserve in any way she can.

Barnard served on an interim management committee that has disbanded now that the NPS has assumed control.

K-State supports its own prairie, the Konza Prairie. It is maintained by the Division of Biology as a research facility. Will the new national park affect its operation?

Dave Hartnett, director of the Konza Prairie, said the Konza has no connection with the preserve, although he has consulted with some preserve personnel on fire-management questions and other issues.

"I view the two sites as complementary," Hartnett said. "We can't provide a lot of public access because of the research, whereas they can provide that access."

GAME

Now re-enter the three-point shot.

Wichita State went on an 11-2 run that put them on top 40-33; however, the Cats came back, but without Eaker. Eaker fouled out of the game with 10:49 left.

"They made sure they took Gerald out of the game. They knew what they were doing," Asbury said.

The tandem of forward Mark Young and guard Ayome May kept the Cats in the game. They each chipped in four points during a five-minute stretch that put the Cats within four.

"We were hitting the shots down the stretch that we needed to hit to keep us close," he said. "Somebody had to step up."

Just when it looked as if the Cats were back in it, Wichita State buried the Cats with a three-pointer.

And another and another and another.

The Shockers were electric from three-point land in the second period. They shot 77.8 percent from beyond the arc in the second half on seven-of-nine shooting from the deep territory.

"It's not any magical mystery tool," Asbury said. "They shot better than us. This isn't rocket science."

Asbury said his team made poor decisions down the stretch that left the Cats without any offensive production.

"We are not good enough offensively to compensate for that kind of a performance on their part," he said.

The three-balls the Shockers made took the wind right out of the Cats' sails, and K-State couldn't get back in it.

Wichita State guard Jason Perez smoked the Cats with four three-pointers in the last 10 minutes and finished the game with a game-high 20 points.

"We've been waiting for that," Smithson said. "He's a heady player, and he takes a lot of chances when he plays, but he does have a lot of intelligence."

Asbury said the Shockers had a good game Tuesday night, and everything was clicking for them.

"Give them credit. The bottom line of that was they made the plays down the stretch and made the foul shots," he said. "We have to learn from it and move on."

With the loss, the Cats record their first of the year. The win by Wichita State was the first win ever by the team here at Bramlage Coliseum and just the third win in the last 10 years.

"This game is over with. It's in the loss column," May said. "We just can't bring this to the next game."

MARRIAGE

Hamrick said the evidence was very clear that the union of a man and a woman in marriage has been a beneficial team that has civilized nations and made a positive difference in world history.

Eichor was not immediately available for comment Tuesday. Both sides had said they would appeal if Chang ruled against them.

If the Hawaii ruling is upheld, gay activists would try to build upon the success and sue to overturn the federal Defense of Marriage Act, said David Smith, spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign, a gay-rights group based in Washington, D.C.

"This is a tremendous victory, but the battle's not over," Smith said. "A major bridge has been crossed, but the battle will continue."

chimps their first taste of life outdoors.

"This is the biggest thing the zoo has ever done," Scott Shoemaker, zoo director, said.

The exhibit will include a tamarin and lemur exhibit, a main building, a baboon exhibit, a concession facility, a gazebo, a colobus exhibit, a spider monkey exhibit and, of course, a chimpanzee exhibit.

The original design was estimated to cost about $1.6 million. The new and accepted design has been estimated at about $500,000, excluding architect fees and bonding expenses.

They also awarded the bid of $492,600 for construction of the exhibit to Sunflower Builders of Manhattan.

"We think they will do a good job," Terry DeWeese, director of parks and recreation, said.

with zero points?

"I don't know. I don't think so," Shocker coach Randy Smithson said. "You have to give Arnold and Williams credit for defending Eaker all night."

Dies finished the evening with five points on two of five shooting in 21 minutes of play.

But Asbury said one could not fault Dies' lack of effort against the Shockers.

"Manny was struggling a bit, but it wasn't because of any lack of effort," Asbury said. "He's been struggling this year, but he'll be fine eventually."

Many times the Cat big men weren't able to receive the ball, and the Cats often struggled with entry passes.

"We had very poor entry passes tonight," Asbury said. "We had some very bad decision-making with our passes, but that isn't something new. We have done that all year."

But a lack of scoring by the big men wasn't the only concern for the Cats. For the night, the Cats only grabbed five offensive rebounds against the smaller Shockers. The Cats had the same problem against Morgan State last Saturday. Against the Bears, the Cats only had one offensive rebound at halftime.

When halftime came against the Shockers, the Cats had grabbed just two offensive rebounds.

Just as against the Bears, the Cats seemed to be out-hustled for balls against the Shockers.

"That's just the kind of team we are. We hustle after balls. We are very scrappy," Smithson said. "Our kids really stepped up today and got after the ball."

Asbury said the team will have to take the loss and make it a learning experience.

"We just have to forgot about this and move on," he said. "Our players will learn from this and will improve on these things."

Court listens to gun-law arguments

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The federal government cannot make local police help enforce the Brady gun-control law, an attorney for two sheriffs from Montana and Arizona told the Supreme Court Tuesday.

There is a prohibition on requiring states to administer a federal regulatory policy, said attorney Stephen Halbrook, representing Sheriff Jay Printz of Ravalli County, Mont., and Sheriff Richard Mack of Graham County, Ariz.

Acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger defended the 1993 law — which requires local officials to conduct a background check of prospective handgun buyers — as a valid effort to curb the nation's 13,000 handgun murders a year.

"The information that this individual (gun buyer) may be a convicted felon is right there in the same county," Dellinger said. "It's a rough-and-ready way to get the most readily available information."

CAN GOVERNMENT COMMANDEER RESOURCES?

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor questioned the notion that the federal government can commandeer state resources to carry out a federal program.

Dellinger acknowledged the government probably could not require states to administer a federal welfare program unless it offered federal money and the chance to opt out.

"This is just a smaller version of that example, is it not?" O'Connor said.

Dellinger said if a county refused to conduct the background checks, "that's the county where felons will buy guns."

BRADY: "IT'S WORKING"

The Brady law was enacted by Congress in 1993 over bitter opposition from gun-control opponents, including the National Rifle Association.

The measure is named after James Brady, who was seriously wounded in the 1981 assassination attempt on President Reagan.

Brady, talking to reporters after the hour-long argument session, had these words for the high court: "Don't strike it ... because it's working."

The measure requires a five-day waiting period before the sale of a handgun. During that time, local authorities must try to find out if the buyer has a felony record, a history of mental illness or

Meat-judging team finishes in top spots

DEBBIE WOOD
staff reporter

K-State's Meats Judging Team is one of two teams in the country to rank in the top third in all their contests.

The team competed in a meet right before Thanksgiving in Dakota City, Neb., and placed third overall.

The meats team has an impressive track record to date with a win at the Iowa State University Invitational Meet in October. In the same month the team placed third at the Excel/High Plains Intercollegiate Contest and took third place at the American Royal Contest in November.

On non-contest weeks, the team practices two to three times per week for a full day each time. Some days it travels to Emporia's IBP meat-packing plant to practice judging the carcasses.

When the team members go into the coolers they have to wear special gear. Hard hats, hair nets and steel boots are just the start. To protect themselves from the cold some members wear leggings under their jeans, turtle necks, sweatshirts, layers of socks and a cooler jacket. Over the cooler jacket they are required to wear a white lab coat and white gloves.

During the fall semester, they must take a class called Principles of Meat Evaluation, which teaches them highlights of what judging meat is all about.

"This team is special," said John Unruh, head coach of the team and associate professor of animal sciences and industry. "They are competitive in every contest. The lowest ranking they've had is third. They are also very solid and consistent, but we just didn't have that extra luck to place first."

Unruh also said he was extremely happy with the way the team members handled themselves during competition.

"They have matured over the course of a year and are better people than when they came into the program," he said.

Being a member of the meats team has other benefits as well. It improves a student's reading, writing and decision-making skills.

After the team judges a class of animals it is asked to give an oral set of reasons justifying why it placed the class as it did.

"We make a lot of decisions, and it teaches us to make a decision and stick with it and defend yourself. It also teaches us thought processes," Ryan Higbie, junior in animal sciences and industry, said.

Unruh said their education goes beyond how they do in a contest.

"They gain information and knowledge in the industry," he said.

When the team members aren't under pressure to perform well, they are busy forming lasting friendships with each other as well as teams from other schools.

"It's a lot of work, but it's worth it. We spend a lot of time with the team in a van traveling to competitions or in a cooler, and we have grown very close because

Farrell battles $400,000 periodical budget-cut dilem-

LILLIAN BEEBE
staff reporter

Farrell Library is being faced with the dilemma of how to cut about $400,000 from the periodicals budget.

"The inflation rate on serials for the last few years has topped 10 percent every year and has been as much as 20 percent in some years," said Nelda Elder, collection development chair.

K-State cannot afford to provide Farrell with a 10-percent or comparable increase for this inflation, she said.

"They need to keep periodicals up. It would be silly to neglect what the library is actually for especially after adding on to it," said Chris Wakefield, senior in geography.

The University allocated $2.5 million in state money to Farrell Library for the purchase of materials. Close to 85 percent of the budget is spent on periodicals, she said.

"That is way too high," Elder said.

This year the dean of libraries did not increase the periodicals budget, Elder said. Instead budget increases are occurring in electronic resources.

Eighty thousand dollars will be used to enhance online, full-text databases along with online indexes and table of contents, Elder said.

About $175,000 will go to enhancing the abstracts and databases already in use, she said.

Farrell Library staff members work with individual colleges and departments on what dollar amount and materials they can cut, Elder said. They think in terms of class use and research when making these decisions.

Farrell publishes and widely distributes a list of proposed cancellations, she said. It provides other departments a chance to appeal a periodical if it's interdisciplinary.

Students can also view the list and appeal, Elder said. They can do this at my office or the circulation desk.

The library tries to honor as many appeals as we can, she said.

"It's easier said than done," Elder said.

With electronic journals Elder hopes to offer some improved document access to solve some problems caused by cancellations, she said.

Electronic journals can be accessed as full-text or full-image depending on the database and the users' needs, Elder said.

Images do transmit more slowly, she said.

"I like the alternative of getting online as a computer user. But I can see for non-computer users or those who lack access the inconvenience," Edward Pokorski, senior in secondary education, said.

"As someone who is extensively using periodicals, it hurts research and learning. It's ultimately going to hurt students, especially graduate students," he said.

With electronic journals comes the fee-or-free issue — whether students should pay for print-outs of articles.

"The bottom line is as we go to more and more full-text offerings, people are printing

Overland Park artist delivers lecture, debuts inaugural Beach museum show

BEACH Museum of Art

ART DISPLAY

▶ "A Dean Mitchell Anthology" will be at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art until Jan. 19. Call 532-7718 for more information.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Dean Mitchell's Wednesday afternoon lecture at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art was a homecoming of sorts.

Mitchell is easily Manhattan's favorite artist, although he hails from Florida and resides in Overland Park. At his last few solo shows at the Strecker Gallery in downtown Manhattan, patrons turned up before the show officially opened to grab a sneak peek at what was to be offered.

So, it was with obvious delight to the community for Mitchell's work to be chosen as an inaugural exhibit at the art museum.

This popularity no doubt thrills Mitchell, whose Wednesday lecture was a balanced discussion of the economics of working as an artist and the joy and pain of expressing one's innermost feelings in the public medium of painting.

"This exhibition at the Beach art museum has been wonderful — Manhattan, Kansas, has been wonderful," Mitchell exclaimed during his well-received lecture, which attracted what is surely a museum record of nearly 100 people.

Mitchell reflected many times during the 1 1/2-hour lecture on his colorful childhood with his grandmother.

"My first painting was a paint-by-number set I got from my grandmother when I was about 5- or 6-years-old," Mitchell said.

He said he painted one of the pictures by the numbers, but the other one was accomplished free-hand, which suggested to him to pursue more artistic endeavors.

Mitchell discusses his youth in Quincy, Fla., as if he were still hanging out on the basketball courts, as he says, awing the local children with what he thought was a masterful artistic talent.

He said when he arrived at the Columbus College of Art and Design in Ohio, he came to the conclusion he needed a lot of technical work.

After graduating with a major in illustration and a minor in advertising, Mitchell went to work for Hallmark in Kansas City designing cards.

His work in commercial illustration remains present in his paintings, which have been criticized in the past for being too photo-realistic.

"It's not just a pretty picture," he said. "It should do something to you. It should make you think."

Mitchell said although his work is realistic, it draws on compositional techniques of more abstract artists like Franz Kline and Mark Rothko.

"You can always learn technique, but learning how to see is much more difficult," Mitchell said.

While leading the audience through the galleries, Mitchell pointed out the ways in which his paintings lead one's eye into and out of the canvas.

"I'm very conscious of edges," he said. "Edges can define space."

Among the other themes emerging from the lecture was Mitchell's repeated references to isolation.

"I've always kept to myself," Mitchell said.

Committee approves projects for bike safety, campus lights

SCOTT CONNER
staff reporter

Projects that will improve bicycle safety and campus lighting were among the projects approved Wednesday night by the City/University Project Fund Committee.

Final approval of the committee's 1998 budget will be voted on by the city commission at a future meeting.

The bicycle-safety project includes the development of additional routes and bicycle parking on campus.

Another project will help improve lighting in the southwest area of campus, which includes Nichols Hall, McCain Auditorium and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The budget proposal also included the University gardens project and a new traffic signal at the intersections of Denison and Kimball avenues.

The K-State Libraries/Manhattan Library Project, which was also funded, will support the continuing development of a community information center that will interconnect the Manhattan and K-State library systems.

The committee also decided to help fund a street improvement that was completed on College Avenue earlier this year, for which K-State was assessed more than half the cost.

All the projects were approved by a broad margin, except for the proposal to develop a community electronic telecommunications facility, which passed by a vote of 4-3.

According to the proposal, a high-tech teleconferencing center would be in the K-State Student Union and would be used to attract groups to the K-State campus and Manhattan. The center would also have computers to aid in decision-making.

Committee member Brett Young said he was opposed to the creation of the center because he thinks there are already sufficient teleconferencing centers available on campus.

Young said spending money to build another center would create a redundancy of services, and all the bases are covered when it comes to the need for a telecommunications center on campus.

Jack Sills, senior executive director of the Union, said the decision-making software, not the teleconferencing capabilities, is what will make the center unique to the area.

Committee member Stephen Thien said he supported the center because he thought teleconferencing centers are very valuable tools and there could never be an abundance of them.

"I felt there wasn't any benefit to the city," committee chairwoman Rosalys Rieger said on why she opposed the funding.

She said she thought the community would not not have enough access to the center.

• JUDGE SENTENCES SCHMITZ TO 25 YEARS. A man who killed a gay admirer who had revealed his crush and hugged him on the "Jenny Jones Show" was sentenced Wednesday to 25 to 50 years in prison. Jonathan Schmitz, 26, faced a life sentence for the murder of Scott Amedure in a case that focused attention on ambush television and the tactics TV producers use to bring guests onto daytime talk shows.

• JUDGE GRANTS STAY OF SAME-SEX MARRIAGES. A day after ordering Hawaii to allow gay marriages, a judge put the ruling on hold Wednesday while the state appeals.

The stay will remain in effect until the state Supreme Court rules, meaning gay couples won't be able to marry in Hawaii for at least a year, if at all. On Tuesday, Hawaii failed to show any compelling state interest in denying gay couples the right to marry. He ordered the state to begin issuing them licenses. It was the such ruling by a judge in the United States.

• BOUTROS-GHALI SUSPENDS CANDIDACY. Beaten down by unrelenting U.S. opposition, U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali suspended his candidacy for a second term Wednesday, opening the way for new nominees for the top U.N. post.

U.N. spokesman Sylvana Foa said the 74-year-old Egyptian diplomat remains a candidate. The United States cast the lone veto against him in the 15-member Security Council on Nov. 19.

• NEW CONSTITUTION FOR SOUTH AFRICA. South Africa gave final approval to a new constitution Wednesday, marking the end of a democratization process that began as President Nelson Mandela languished in prison.

Nearly six years after Mandela's release and after tough negotiations and political violence, the Constitutional Court certified the document that will extinguish any legal legacy of apartheid.

Considered one of the most liberal constitutions in the world, the 150-page document outlaws capital punishment, protects gay and lesbian rights and includes a Bill of Rights that guarantees equal rights for all. It took two years to negotiate.

The new document will gradually replace an interim constitution, taking full effect in 1999.

DEAN MITCHELL speaks to listeners about his work Wednesday afternoon. Mitchell is an artist from Overland Park.
CLIF PALMBERG

Turning to his newer, more abstracted work, such as "Pears," Mitchell refers to them as experimental.

In "Pears," the isolation manifests with two pears stranded on a table top, yet one side of the painting is curiously voided black.

"I always leave a place for your eye to travel," he said. "I always leave this place to escape, to hide.

"I've always been somewhat introverted."

The year 1984 was a turning point in his career. Fired from Hallmark, newly divorced and facing the death of his grandmother, Mitchell turned toward his work.

"It grew me up real fast," he said.

This period of his life spawned a darkly introverted self-portrait — a rich purple-shaded painting of himself as a collapsed, isolated figure, almost evoking, as he pointed out, the personage of a vampire.

"It's too revealing," Mitchell said. "It shows a lot of fear."

If Mitchell still experiences a fear, it's not of success. His work has gained increasing exposure garnering awards, a commission by the U.S. Postal Service to design their series of jazz musician stamps, and rising prices.

Mitchell said he does not let money dictate his work, although he thinks African American artists suffer in the art world by receiving less money for work and varied responses from a largely white patronage.

"I don't care who supports my work, but I would like to see a turnout of the community at large," he said.

Those of us who can't afford even the lower prices of Mitchell's work can pick up a new poster at the art museum gift shop or the soon-to-be-released catalog of his work at the Strecker Gallery.

K-State professor's research project focuses on adolescent self-perception

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

Our culture poisons girls.

One K-State professor, however, is making it her mission to help adolescent girls gain positive perceptions about their own femininity through reading.

Angela Hubler, assistant professor of English and women's studies, chose to face this challenge because of the media attention and research focused on adolescent boys and girls.

According to the research, the girls were found to have lower self-esteem than boys after observing negative images of females in the media.

Hubler said many factors contribute to the negative self-perceptions of adolescent girls. She said she agreed with Mary Pipher, author of "Reviving Ophelia," when Pipher said American culture poisons girls.

"For one, sexual harassment does affect self-esteem. There is also a huge discrepancy between the images of healthy women and models. Many movies, such as 'Pretty Woman' and 'Indecent Proposal,' depict females to be nothing more than bodies. These are degrading and negative images," she said.

But these images still have a tremendous effect on adolescent girls. Half the girls were reported to be on a diet, while one in five girls was diagnosed with eating disorders, statistics Hubler said greatly disturbed her.

To combat this destructive cycle, she said she wanted to find an antidote to help adolescent girls gain positive perceptions about femininity.

Hubler began her research by interviewing 39 girls from grades six to 12 from Manhattan, Fort Riley and Junction City. She asked the girls what kind of female characters they liked to read about.

> "Many movies, such as 'Pretty Woman' and 'Indecent Proposal', depict females to be nothing more than bodies."
> • ANGELA HUBLER
> ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH AND WOMEN'S STUDIES

"Many of the responses were uniform. The girls agreed that they liked to read about strong and independent characters, like Nancy Drew, Anne of Green Gables and Anne Frank. I wanted to present positive images of girls that were different," she said.

Hubler presented her research at the Children's Literature Association Conference in Charlotte, N.C., last June in hopes educators would agree that portraying positive images for adolescent girls through reading was important.

"Many of the girls I interviewed said they did not have much exposure to women authors, and there are important women writers. For the girls to achieve and succeed, they need role models, which these books provide," Hubler said.

Hubler not only instigated this research project, but she also found enjoyment while interacting with the girls and finding common literary interests.

"Most girls were willing to express the stuff they liked, and I got a very positive response from them. What was interesting to me was that the books they chose were ones I loved as a young girl. These books have staying power," Hubler said.

"Anne of Green Gables," "The Secret Garden," "Little Women" and "The Diary of Anne Frank" were among the chosen readings that prove women can be nurturing and caring as well as strong and independent, she said.

Hubler's future goals include implementing reading groups in public schools and libraries, and having discussions with both adolescent boys and girls concerning these cultural issues.

But until people's ideas change, Hubler said, she thinks her research will have little influence on the way females are viewed in today's society.

"This is a complicated problem with no simple answer. We need to teach men to respect women in a different way. But people's ideas have to change first before we can accomplish our goals," Hubler said.

Live-cut Christmas trees outlawed in schools

ANDREA COREY
staff reporter

Live-cut Christmas trees have been outlawed in Kansas schools including inside K-State campus buildings.

The Fire Service Council of Kansas unanimously recommended to the Kansas fire marshal that no live-cut trees be permitted in schools.

Andrew Fink, residence-life coordinator, said using artificial trees shouldn't be too much of a problem for residence-hall residents.

"For a few students it is going to be a change," he said.

Fink said in the past some students pooled money to buy live-cut trees, and the Department of Housing and Dining Services provided a service to dip the trees in flame-resistant chemicals. Now, he said, Hall Governing Boards may pitch in money from hall funds to purchase new artificial trees.

Dwain Archer, director of fire-safety inspection for K-State, said the Kansas fire marshal outlawed live-cut trees, because dry pine needles are very flammable.

"Live-cut trees tend to dry up, the needles tend to dry up. The dryer they become, the more combustible," he said.

Archer added that a person shopping for holiday lights or an artificial tree needs to make sure both products have Underwriter's Laboratory tags. He said products with these UL tags have been tested to make certain they are safe for normal use.

Archer said to prevent fires it's important to remember not

Greeks aid Adopt-a-School program

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

Sorority and fraternity members are going back to elementary school. Yep, that's right. Adopt-a-School is bringing these K-State students back to the basics.

The National Interfraternity Council, along with Panhellenic Council, sponsors the greek event nationwide.

About 100 K-Staters volunteered for the program. The college students go to certain participating elementary schools upon request and work with teachers and students.

"It is similar to being a teacher's aide, but not quite," said Carla Huhtanen, co-coordinator and junior in elementary/special education and art.

"We go and play with the kids and have fun," she said.

Volunteers can work around their busy schedules and still participate. The mentors help tutor kids, participate in playground activities and lend a hand to after-school clubs.

The volunteers are now working with five schools in the Manhattan area, said Mike Farow, co-coordinator and sophomore in civil engineering.

"We are helping the kids of the future, and it's great for the community," he said.

The schools benefit from the program, because it is strictly a volunteer program. Many schools need help, especially after school, Farow said.

Along with elementary schools, the volunteers are also working with the Head Start program.

The National Adopt-a-School program is only about a year old.

"We are trying to lay the groundwork this year and publicize it," Farow said.

For anyone interested in helping with the project next semester, there is a training meeting. Volunteers can get more information at 8 p.m. Sunday in Union 207.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

You might as well get fee payment done now

If you don't deal with fee payment now, you might end up paying for it later.

Because spring 1997 is the first semester students pay their tuition and fees by mail, it might be hard to get the process right. A mistake could result in dropped schedules and a lot of frustration in Fairchild Hall.

WHY WE CARE

Procrastinating on figuring out the new fee-payment system and mailing in the information will cause more hassles for you in January.

This week, students have been receiving account statements in the mail, telling them how much money they owe. However, Pell grants and Stafford loans have not been figured into these statements, and some students rely on this money to pay fees.

Read the enclosed literature, and call the Office of Financial Assistance at 532-6420 if you have questions or if you need to notify them that you need your loans and grants to pay your balance.

If the phone lines are busy, which they often are, go over there and wait in line. It'll pay off later, when you don't have to stand in line, freezing, outside Ahearn Field House, or when you don't have to run around getting re-enrolled in classes you were dropped from because you fell through the cracks in the new system.

If you're strapped for cash, you can pay your fees in installments. There's a handy little insert with your account statement. Read it carefully, so you don't end up paying for something you don't want in the end.

And if all is well and you can pay your fees through the mail on time, don't wait until the last minute and rely on the speedy service of the U.S. Postal Service.

Get it done now, before finals week arrives and all you can think about is memorizing the stages of cell division and how to figure out statistics confidence intervals.

If you're confused, use the resources and staff available at the financial aid office. They're there to help. After all, this is your class schedule and your money. Don't let it go to waste.

A Collegian legend says goodbye, encourages readers to keep believing

MY

Erin MANSUR-SMITH

I am retiring from the Collegian.

Yes, it's true. It's really true. After this semester ends in almost one week, I will, officially and permanently, no longer be a member of the opinion staff. (Kevin, quit crying. You're the editor, for God's sake. Get up off the floor.)

Contrary to popular belief, I am not leaving because of the sex scandal that has been floating around the Collegian newsroom involving me, Russell Fortmeyer and a mouse pad. They are unsubstantiated rumors and whoever began them must be destroyed.

I am also not leaving because I am sick and tired. Although I am. I haven't seen natural sunlight since I started here, four or five decades ago. (I thought I saw it a couple of times, but it was really just Kevyn Jacobs' legs in a pair of shorts.)

I have funny little imprints permanently tattooed on my face from sleeping on the newsroom couch too often. God only knows the last time I had a meal that didn't involve MSG, plastic silverware or chew.

But I am not leaving because of any of these things. I am leaving because it is time.

When I first started here, my editor's name was Jared. He was a rather intense, some might say psychotic, individual with a habit of allowing his eyes to roll into the back of his head whenever he was in a bad mood.

He didn't get into those moods more than four or five times a day. Four if there were any Mountain Dews left in the vending machine by the time of the nightly staff meeting. Five if he happened to see me at any time.

I was a green kid who had been hired on the strength of one emotional guest column and was absolutely terrified of him and my job. I was sure I would write the wrong thing and become the first columnist in the history of college papers to be hanged from the K-State Student Union.

This fear, as well as my inability to find the on-switch to my computer, blocked my creative juices. I couldn't think of anything important to say. Yes, I had an opinion. Opinions are a dime a dozen, but there was nothing special about what I believed in. There was no reason for people to listen to me.

Finally, in complete despair, I approached Jared. I told him my dilemma, adding at the end my personal belief that they had made a mistake in hiring me. My opinion was not worth listening to.

Jared looked at me, the little vein on the left side of his neck throbbing in beat with the tic above his right eye.

"Do you believe in anything?" he said. I told him yes. I believed in Santa Claus, the Tooth Fairy and President Jon Wefald among other things.

"Can you think?" Most of the time. As long as doing so doesn't involve fractions.

"Then write it down."

"But no one ... "

"They'll read," he growled at me. "If you believe, and think and write it down, someone will read it. Most of the time they won't agree, and they probably won't like you. But they will read, and they will think."

Since that day, I have done the best I can to believe, to think and then write it down. I haven't always been right. (I saved that chore for some of my more conservative colleagues). And, I know, I haven't always written my opinions as eloquently as I could have.

But I have always tried to influence you all to positively examine all your beliefs and to really think about why you have them. I have always tried to encourage everyone to do something constructive with those values, regardless of whether you agree with me.

Of all the issues I have written about, of all the ones I want to be remembered for, those I have spoken most persistently about and the issues who are closest to my heart are those about HIV/AIDS awareness.

If there is any one concern requiring people of conscience, it is this one. If there is one issue people need to think about, believe in, and respond to in a constructive and positive manner, it is this one.

If there is any one cause that should be taken to the heart of every student, faculty and staff member of this campus, it should be this one. Because we are dying — students, faculty and staff. We are dying in greater numbers every day.

Some of our names are hanging on a quilt in the Union this week.

You don't have to like me. You don't have to agree with me. But please, believe. Please think. Please, go and see.

Erin Mansur-Smith is a graduate student in theater and has one more column left. You can reach her by e-mail at (2bornt2b@ksu.edu).

Manhattan P.I.

Maybe it wasn't exactly like Dick Tracy, but at least we have the memories

BILL KRAAI/Collegian

MY

Nikola Maria ZYTKOW

It was a crazy idea. I admit it.

But we were desperate — desperate for cash, that is. And the alternatives were not pretty.

Let's see, there was bustin' suds at Taco Hut, doing construction on Kansas Highway 177 or dancing at Dr. Love's. (Look, we had to consider all of the options).

After the Collegian, we didn't want to regress to scrubbin' and rubbin' fajita plates. We weren't thrilled with the idea of nearly getting trampled by a current of cars. And, in the end, even Dr. Love's lost out.

"We have a hard time getting naked in front of our gynecologist. How are we gonna get naked in front of a bunch of complete strangers?" Sera said.

She had a point.

What the heck, we thought. Let's start a detective agency.

We'd call the company Snoop & Snip. The Snoop part referring to the detective part of the business. The Snip referring to the beauty shop.

We'd be Manhattan's own Magnum, P.I.s.

We'd smoke fat cigars like Columbo, wear trenches like Dick Tracy, and sport all the wacky disguises of Sherlock Holmes. Yes, we would be the sleuths of the century.

OK, so there might not be any money-laundering cases in our future, no murders to crack. But no problem. The smut is what we were after. Ya know — cheating boyfriends, scandalous girlfriends, steamy back seats of parked cars, couples engaged in the most illicit of indoor sports.

Our hand-held camcorders would capture it all on film.

For the bargain price of $10, we would provide a much-needed service to one of the largest dating communities in the Midwest. We were, after all, journalists, trained in the art of sniffing out shifty activities of all sorts.

We had it made. Or so we thought.

You might wonder where the heck the Snip part fits in. Well, naturally after we found out the client's man or woman was being unfaithful, we'd provide our clients with a full makeover. A sort of feel-good deal for the recently devastated.

Ya know, get their self-esteem up a bit with a shampoo, rinse and style. An avocado facial mask and a speck of blue toenail polish could go a long way to healing a splintered heart.

OK, so it was all a tad tasteless. But like I said, we were dirt po' — as in destitute, strapped for cash, penniless, no dinero. In other words, butt broke.

We decided to stick with Snoop & Snip. (Originally we planned on adding a Sniff to it — a flower shop). But we decided it would be too much for this too-tame Midwestern community. Got to give it to 'em one bit at a time.

The advertisement in the Collegian classifieds cemented our commitment to the plan. Anxious, we waited for the influx of calls. And we waited, and waited and waited.

Not one damn call. Not one measly client. Not even a prank caller. Pitiful.

Sorry. I'm still a little bitter.

Eventually, Sera and I pulled ourselves together. After a series of Stuart Smalley's affirmation sessions (I'm good enough, I'm smart enough and doggone it, people like me), we decided we were not business failures. Manhattan was simply not ready for our radical ideas. We were way too progressive.

You might wonder why I'm reminiscing on this disastrous endeavor, which happened oh so long ago (last semester).

Just about to enter the REAL WORLD, I'm desperate to cling to the familiar — to these rapidly vanishing good ol' days.

College is the time to take these silly risks. It's a time to be a financial parasite, either on your parents or the government (loans, baby). It's a time to go out on a limb and still have the comfort of knowing you're on the road to a successful career.

So what if a quick gig falls through, if a get-rich-quick scheme flops. It'll just be chucked up as "that CRAZY THING we once did back when we were a bunch of wild and wacky kids."

Now that I'm looking for a real job, things are noticeably more tense. There's no room for bad decisions, no room for the short term. Nope. It's all about job security and a steady pay check.

So, while I send out hundreds of résumés, stress about interview suits and spend my free time reading "100 Answers to the Toughest Interview Questions," it's fun to reminisce.

Soon I will be getting up day in and day out. And not just to scribble down lecture notes, drink cappuccino and take multiple-choice tests. Ahh, the good life.

No more month-long Christmas breaks, no more late-night partying, no more crazy schemes. It's time to start thinking competitive markets, taxes, health insurance, stocks and bonds.

Not that the options are completely closed. If, for instance, I turn out to be a total failure in the REAL WORLD, there's always Taco Hut.

Graduate teaching assistants share their concerns for themselves, students

Editor,

As graduate teaching assistants, we are writing to share some of our concerns. These issues affect not only us as teachers, but also have negative consequences for our students.

Every few years, GTAs across campus are coming under and having to fight off detrimental teaching loads put on them by the administration. This situation is repeated as one group of GTAs is cycled out and another group is brought in.

The parameters and requirements of the positions that were agreed upon, only a few years ago by the administration, faculty and GTAs are in danger of being broken and rewritten.

Specifically, these parameters deal with class sizes, teaching requirements and course loads. As graduate students who hope to one day be a permanent part of the teaching community, we are dedicated instructors who are committed to teaching and giving our students the highest quality of instruction possible.

With increased teaching loads and class sizes, the quality of instruction we can give will go down. In addition, if every few years, we, as a group with the aid of the faculty, have to fight the administration to retain the parameters and guidelines agreed upon previously, our time and energy are necessarily taken away from teaching, which is our primary goal.

Because of the reasons above, we are in the process of organizing to discuss what can be done to give us more of a voice in decisions that are made about our employment conditions.

In an effort to hear from as many voices as possible, the Graduate Employee Alliance is asking to hear from GTAs across campus, from every department and college.

We believe that as a united force we can secure changes in current policies and better serve graduate-student employee interests and those of our students.

Letter was ignorant, not bigoted

Editor,

I would just like to make a short response to Micah Hawkinson's letter in Tuesday's Collegian. I personally do not consider you to be either a homophobe or a hating bigot. What I do consider you to be is ignorant.

To say that homosexual sex in and of itself is a cause of the spread of HIV is a large misconception. The passing of this virus has and always will be through the exchange of bodily fluids, via sharing of IV needles, transfusions with untested blood and unsafe sex practices.

In unsafe sex practices, I mean both homosexual and heterosexual. It does not matter which, therefore anyone can get it. It does not have any ethical, gender or sexual orientation boundaries. The only truly safe sex practice is not to engage in sex.

I sincerely hope that you find out the facts about this disease and closely examine your own lifestyle. Everyone is potentially at risk.

Group educates to reduce fears

A group of K-State students is trying to raise awareness of sexually transmitted diseases and make a difference in the community.

STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators serve as a link between K-State students and Lafene Health Center.

SHAPE members educate student groups about the emotional, physical and social issues regarding STDs.

One of SHAPE's goals is to reduce fears and eliminate prejudices related to HIV and AIDS.

SHAPE gives presentations to campus and non-campus groups. The group speaks to fraternities, sororities and residence-hall floors.

Its sessions provide information and literature about STDs and attempt to promote positive attitudes about health and total well-ness.

Jennifer Hall, president of SHAPE, said increasing awareness about STDs, including HIV and AIDS, is the organization's main goal.

"We all think it's an important cause," Hall said. "If we help just one person, it makes all the work worthwhile."

SHAPE also tries to provide students a better understanding of health-related services offered by K-State and the surrounding communities.

Students wanting to join SHAPE are required to fill out a detailed application. If the applicant meets the group's requirements, an interview will be scheduled.

Hall said SHAPE has to screen the applicants thoroughly, because the group's members have to have enough time in their schedules so they can commit to speaking engagements.

"The application process is lengthy," Hall said. "The group requires a lot of dedication and time."

Applicants must be willing to provide a one-year commitment to the program to keep the presentations available throughout the year.

At least three members of SHAPE go to each presentation. The group tries to give each presentation a new setting by rotating members so the three presenters are never the same.

"It's a fun organization, because you get close to the people you work with," Hall said.

There are 20 students in SHAPE. Ten are new, and 10 are returning members.

Hall said the majority of the members are women, because men tend to shy away from the group.

"I'd really like it to be 50-50, but more women seem to apply," Hall said.

Credit reports can help students in future

Ashley Celler
staff reporter

Obtaining a copy of a credit report doesn't have to put you deeper in debt.

Dale Thierolf, president and owner of the Manhattan Credit Bureau, said that if people apply for credit and they are denied, they have the opportunity to ascertain the reasons for the denial by receiving a free copy of their credit history.

When a company refuses credit to someone, the company is required to write a letter stating its reasons for its refusal to grant credit upon request.

In addition, the letter should offer the name, address and phone number of the credit bureau it received the credit information from.

This allows people to request a free copy of their credit report within a 30-day period, Thierolf said.

People aren't always aware they have access their credit history without spending a lot of money and going through a hassle to get it.

Alison Lazzara, senior in interior architecture, said she took advantage of the opportunity to receive a credit report.

"I applied for a credit card and was denied," she said. "The company sent me a letter with a number on it, and in three weeks I received a copy of my credit report.

"More students should take advantage of this offer if they have the chance, because it is important to know where you stand in case there is something on your report which could keep you from getting credit in the future," she said.

Checking a credit report could be especially useful if people are planning to make a purchase or apply for a loan, because their credit history could affect these purchasing plans, Thierolf said.

"It is also important for an individual to check up on their credit report if they suspect some type of mix-up or mistake has occurred," Thierolf said.

He explained that if a mistake is discovered, the person should write a letter to the company they received the report from, explaining what the problem is. The company should notify the individual when it receives the letter.

Depending on whether the mistake is valid, the credit company will erase it from the report.

However, just because a particular credit company erases a mistake on a report, this doesn't mean that same mistake won't still be present on a report from another credit company.

"It's like going to Sears to buy a dress and then going the JCPenney to buy a dress. You're purchasing two dresses, but they look very different," Thierolf said.

Southwestern Bell helps Kansans go "on-line"
Southwestern Bell introduced an exciting new grant program this year called the Kansas Community Enrichment Program. Designed to help Kansas organizations use technology to advance the quality of life in their communities, the program received an overwhelming response in its first year — more than 200 applications from every corner of the state!
Harry Watts
Under the Kansas Community Enrichment Program, a total of $300,000 in grant money was made available during 1996 through the SBC Foundation, the philanthropic arm of Southwestern Bell. These funds will help Kansas communities and organizations in their efforts to use new technologies to improve education, economic development, health care, and community access to information services.
The many projects funded during 1996 included: creation of an interactive Web site for the Wichita Art Museum, on-line access for patrons of the Garden Plain Community Library, the introduction of robotics technology for Plainville Middle School students, and the delivery of patient education via home computer by the Lindsborg Community Hospital.
Both the number and quality of the applications were impressive — representing just the kind of community/corporate partnerships essential for Kansas to position itself for the 21st century. At Southwestern Bell, we're excited to provide funding for community projects of this nature, because by nurturing innovation, we're helping Kansans build the future our children deserve.
To be eligible for funding under the Kansas Community Enrichment Program, an organization must be classified as a government entity or have 501 (c) 3 tax-exempt status and be located in a Kansas community receiving telephone service from Southwestern Bell.
Due to the success of the Kansas Community Enrichment Program this year, those of us at Southwestern Bell are pleased to announce that funding for technology projects will again be available to Kansas organizations in 1997. If you're interested in receiving an application form, please call toll-free 1-800-622-5078.

KELLI LUTHER, Kim Zschau and Devon Ryning celebrate K-State's victory over Cal State-Northridge Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House.

Wildcats smash Matadors in 3 out of 4 games, and while at home, the Cats discover

THAT WINNING FEELING

STORY BY DAN LEWERENZ • PHOTO BY CARY CONOVER

The biggest match in the history of K-State volleyball became the biggest win in the history of K-State volleyball Wednesday night when the No. 24 Wildcats topped Cal State-Northridge 15-12, 14-16, 15-11, 15-13 in Ahearn Field House.

Although the win might have been what the Wildcats wanted, the flow of the match was not at all what Coach Jim Moore had in mind.

"One of the things I really wanted to do was jump on them early to get the crowd into it," he said. "We didn't do that."

What the Cats did was dig themselves an early hole. Neither team managed to score many points in the first game. The first 44 rallies resulted in just 11 points, with 33 side-outs. But eight of those points went to Northridge.

"I think all 12 of us just decided we weren't going to lose this match," senior Toie Young said.

So the Cats fought back. A 6-0 run over the next 15 rallies gave K-State a 9-8 lead.

Northridge fought back, retaking the lead at 11-10, but the Cats would prevail 15-13.

Game two looked like a replay of game one. The Matadors extended to an 8-3 lead before K-State again fought back with a 6-0 run. But this time the tide turned against the Cats.

K-State served for the game at 14-13, but a kill by Northridge's Getty Dimitrova returned the ball to the Matadors, who ran off three straight points for a 16-14 victory.

Part of the Matador advantage seemed to come from the softness of the attacks. Instead of swinging away, they favored a soft tap over the blockers just in front of K-State's back-row defenders.

"From what we've seen of them on film, they do that a lot," Moore said. "We didn't do a good job of defending that until the very end."

Momentum seemed to be working against K-State in game three, when the Wildcats fell behind 10-3, the biggest margin of the match. But Young and sophomore Val Wieck took over. Wieck landed five kills and Young seven to power a 12-1 run that gave the Cats a 15-11 decision.

"There have been a couple times this year when I thought they demonstrated what kind of character they have," Moore said of the comeback. "I don't know what to say about what a display of character they showed. That has nothing to do with me. That has to do with them."

K-State finally took an early lead in the fourth game, taking a 5-2 lead when a Northridge attack got caught in the net.

But the Matadors were not ready to die yet. Nancy Ma went on a rampage, registering five consecutive kills in the middle of an 11-3 run that gave Northridge a 13-8 lead.

Again the Cats fought back. All six starters scored a point or a side-out in K-State's final 7-0 run before Northridge's last two attacks found the net and gave K-State the match.

Young led the Cats with 26 kills and a .435 hitting percentage. Freshman Abbie Brown finished with 22 kills, senior Kate DeClerk had 21 (.425), Wieck added 19, and sophomore Kim Zschau had 18.

"If you look at the stats, this is exactly what I wanted for the distribution," Moore said. "The kills are so close. They distributed the ball very well."

"The fans have been great all year. Considering where we are and how far we've come, the fans embraced us so well," Moore said.

"In that third game they jumped on the official, which shows their ability and knowledge of the game — not jumping on the official, but that they understood what was going on and how critical it was to get in the game. And that's great."

K-State volleyball is going to keep getting better. No, DeClerk and Young will not be back. Nor will senior Kelli Luther.

But four starters and the top two reserves will return to the No. 4 team in the most powerful conference in the country.

And with them will be the thousands who know they've found a winner.

Potent offense helps Cats defeat Matadors

SHANE MCCORMICK
sports writer

In its first NCAA tournament victory over Cal State-Northridge, K-State received some big contributions from its veterans and young players.

Once again leading the Cats in kills was senior Toie Young, with 26. Her 26 kills was a career high, eclipsing her previous mark of 24 against Valparaiso.

But despite the career high, Young did not come out of the gates swinging. It wasn't until late in the first game that Young recorded her first kill.

"Well, getting set helps," Young said. "But it did take me a while to get into my groove."

Once Young found her groove, nobody on the Matadors team could find a way to block her.

In the crucial third game, with the Cats down, they turned to Young. She responded with three straight kills that went through anything in their path. The kills sparked the Cats and put them up 12-11. The game ended up, fittingly, with another kill for Young. In game three, Young recorded 10 kills.

"Toie is just so physical and talented," Coach Jim Moore said. "I think people forget that she really doesn't have a lot of experience. She didn't play a lot before coming here.

"She is just a tremendously gifted player."

Joining Young in setting a new career high in kills was sophomore Val Wieck. Wieck eclipsed her previous best of 15 with a 19-kill performance against the Matadors.

Wieck also played a key role in the come-from-behind victory for the Cats in game three. In that game, Wieck recorded eight kills.

"If you look at the statistics, that is exactly what we hoped for out of Val," Moore said.

Moore said making Wieck a threat early was a key move for the Cats.

"She terminated the ball very well early on, and that made her a threat," he said. "We were a little worried that she wouldn't be a threat in the game. Our ability to distribute the ball was due to Val's presence early."

As usual, getting Young and Wieck the ball was junior setter Devon Ryning. With 88 assists against the Matadors, Ryning set a new school record for assists in a four-game match.

"The character our team demonstrated tonight was just incredible," Moore said. "It is something I cannot teach. All 12 of our players contributed to this win tonight."

Crowd support essential to volleyball victory at home

MY

Dan LEWERENZ

Thank you.

A season of success for the K-State volleyball team continued last night with a 3-1 win over Cal State-Northridge in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats now move to Pullman, Wash., where they'll take on No. 9 Washington State.

Much has been said (in this column, in fact) about how the arrival of Coach Jim Moore and the revival of the K-State volleyball program were more than just coincidence.

Much has been said about how K-State's star players, a category that now includes all six of the Wildcat starters, have powered the Cats to the upper echelon of both conference and national competition.

What hasn't been said until now was how important Dean Hall and Christina Williams and Lance Davidson and Ruth Ann Wefald and all the other devoted fans are to the program.

K-State finished the season the No. 16 team in the nation in average attendance, drawing almost 1,500 fans per match. Twice, against Kansas and Nebraska, the crowd topped 4,000, with the Nov. 15 match against the Cornhuskers setting a school record with 4,958 fans.

But still the numbers seemed like background noise.

Sure, they were loud. But the Wildcats could have all Krazy-Glued their hands to their thighs and still beat the Jayhawks. And the fans were unable to push the Cats over the edge against Nebraska.

The Wildcats could have all Krazy-Glued their hands to their thighs and still beat the Jayhawks.

(I just love saying that. Having that sort of edge over the 'Hawks is a thrill in and of itself.)

It wasn't until the NCAA Tournament that the fans and the team came together for an awesome display of volleyball magic.

And what a time to peak. Despite all the hype of having home-court advantage, Moore said it can be easier to play on the road in the tournament.

"It's so hard to play at home, because if you lose, you're a loser," he said. "It's so hard to keep from thinking you should win, that you're supposed to win."

The Wildcats were dragging in the early goings of each game, falling behind by as many as seven points.

But as soon as K-State would get a side-out, the fans were back on their feet, urging the Cats back into the match.

"I think it helped us a lot," senior Kate DeClerk said. "We would get down on ourselves sometimes, and the crowd would get us back into it."

And what a crowd it was. In describing the lift the fans gave the Cats, senior Toie Young said, "It was so great to have 5,000 ... "

"Two thousand," Moore interrupted, pointing to the official attendance (2,051) on the box score.

"There were more than 2,000 people in there," Young responded.

Who knows who was right? But it certainly felt as if there were 5,000 roaring, stomping, screaming Cat fans in the rafters.

And that's part of the magic of Ahearn. With just one-third of the building in use and a mere 2,000 (or 5,000) fans, the floor rocked, and the walls shook.

K-State volleyball has found its spot.

And K-State has found volleyball. Although the numbers have been there all year — seven matches drew more than 1,000 fans each — the fans are getting the feel for the sport that is so much more important than just cheering when the PA guy says, "Point, Cats."

"The fans have been great all year. Considering where we are and how far we've come, the fans embraced us so well," Moore said.

"In that third game they jumped on the official, which shows their ability and knowledge of the game — not jumping on the official, but that they understood what was going on and how critical it was to get in the game. And that's great."

K-State volleyball is going to keep getting better. No, DeClerk and Young will not be back. Nor will senior Kelli Luther.

But four starters and the top two reserves will return to the No. 4 team in the most powerful conference in the country.

And with them will be the thousands who know they've found a winner.

Dancers, kids perform in WinterDance

JESS LOUK
staff reporter

Smooth, fluid, breathtaking dance will heat up the frigid Manhattan area tonight.

The K-State department of dance will present Winterdance '96.

Vera Orlock, assistant professor of dance, said she encourages students to go.

"What they might get from going is seeing well-trained bodies do some amazing things," Orlock said. "It's the poetry of the body."

Winterdance '96 will feature 45 K-State students, including cast and crew, Orlock said. Twenty-three area elementary-school students will dance in elf costumes.

"The kids are adorable. They're so cute," Vanessa Vaughn, sophomore in theater and co-stage manager, said.

Guest artist Sean Curran of the off-Broadway show "Stomp" will perform excerpts from his "Five Points of Articulations."

The music will be set to the works of Dvorjak, Janacek and Kreisler.

"A lot of talented people will be performing," Orlock said.

"It could be very inspiring to see not only what the K-State students do when they perform other works of choreography but when they perform their own student work."

Tickets for Winterdance '96 are on sale at McCain Box Office. The show will be performed at 8 p.m. Today through Saturday at Nichols Theatre. Tonight's performance has already sold out.

Students will pay $7 and the general public will pay $8.

"I'm really excited to see everything with costumes," Vaughn said. "It's going to be neat when it's put together with lights. I'm just excited to be a part of it."

Find the space shuttle on the Net

website review

People have been looking up since ancient times. Flight has always fascinated us, but has only become possible in recent history. This week we journey onto the Internet to discover how the Net looks up.

NASA Shuttle Web: STS-80 (http://shuttle.nasa.gov/)

The people at NASA have been leaders on the World Wide Web since its beginning more than 20 years ago. This site is no exception.

Surfers will first find themselves looking at a mock touch pad, which makes this page easier to look at.

It will give viewers anything they ever wanted to know about the space-shuttle program and then some.

I recommend while the shuttle is still in flight to go to the tracking section to get an up-to-date, minute-by-minute location of the shuttle in orbit.

The graphics are clean and crisp, well-designed for even surfers who may be required to use a modem. Some nice pictures of the shuttle are scattered throughout the homepage that help to keep it interesting.

To download the M-PEG movies, surfers will probably need an ethernet connection, but if you have the means, I highly recommend doing so.

Overall, this is an excellent site to help blow off a couple of unneeded hours.

More than a million visitors in the last month can't be wrong.

The Astronomy Cafe (http://www2.ari.net/home/odenwald/cafe.html)

If you're a would-be astronomer who is having troubles differentiating a quasar from pulsar, this is the site for you. Its motto is: "The Web site for the astronomically disadvantaged."

This site's real claim to fame is the ability for users to ask their question to a real astronomer who will answer.

If you just want to learn, Odenwald has archived past questions.

Don't expect much in the way of graphics here, although the pages download very quickly.

Rocket Belt Dot Com (http://www.rocket-belt.com/home.htm)

Have you been wanting to fly, but the LSD is too hard on your system? These guys are willing to help.

This site is an archive for information about rocket belts. It's a dream come true for all those "The Fall Guy" fans who want to fly just like Lee Majors did.

For those thinking about getting their own rocket belt, this site has an online ordering store where users can get the blueprints and other things they need to lift off.

This page has become slow lately, so good luck viewing it.

Space Movie Archive Gateway (http://www.univrennes1.fr/ASTRO/anim-e.html)

This site boasts the largest online collection of space animations on the Web.

I recommend this site for fun, because it has some entertaining clips.

Not only are there animations of nearly every space event imaginable, the site also includes clips from popular science-fiction shows like "Babylon 5" and "Star Trek."

Unfortunately, the site is from France, so even with an ethernet connection, it is slow unless you're surfing in Europe.

Solar System Live (http://www.fourmilab.ch/solar/solar.html)

Ever wonder where the planets are at this very moment? With this site surfers can find out where all the planets are at anytime, anywhere.

I haven't figured out a good practical use for this page outside of the world of physics.

Just try entering your birthday and see how the planets line up. Hey, it's better than studying.

Every week, Darin Siefkes, senior in history, and radio and television, will review various sites on the World Wide Web. Do you know an interesting site, have a question or want to comment? E-mail Siefkes at (wings@ksu.ksu.edu).

- Do not overload electrical circuits or extension cords.

to connect too many strings of light together, and to make sure the lights aren't near water, or in a door hinge where the wires can become frayed.

Archer said it is important not to overload an outlet with too many light sets.

And while there seems to be a lot of concern about live-cut trees being flammable, Rick Fay, a fire - protection specialist for the Kansas fire marshal, said in his opinion, true live-cut trees aren't a problem, as long as the tree is fresh.

"Trees shipped from Oregon and Washington aren't live-cut," he said, saying an already-cut tree might have been cut weeks before it's purchased.

Fay said that if people are considering buying a tree for their home, they should go to a tree farm to make sure that it is indeed freshly cut. He said it is also important to water the tree so it doesn't begin to dry and therefore become flammable.

drug use, or some other problem that would make the sale illegal.

By late 1998, the federal government is to create a national system to provide instant criminal-background checks.

CRITICS: CHECKS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Halbrook said the background-check requirement would be unconstitutional even if local police had plenty of time to perform the duty.

"Regardless of the burden or lack thereof, these commands are not constitutional," he said.

But Halbrook ran into trouble when he said the Brady law would be unconstitutional even if it merely required local police to let federal employees check local records.

RULING BY JULY

After Tuesday's argument, the justices are expected to decide by July whether the background-check requirement is lawful.

The government estimates the law prevented firearm sales to more than 60,000 criminals in two years.

The ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the background-check requirement in 1995, saying it was a minor burden similar to state officials' duty to report missing children or traffic fatalities to the federal government.

THE BRADY FOE

Lawyers for Mack, who lost his re-election bid and leaves office in January, said in court papers the law forced him to divert deputies from crime-fighting duties.

In some recent decisions, the justices have signaled a shift in the balance of power between states and the federal government.

Last year they struck down a federal law that banned gun possession within 1,000 feet of schools, saying the states — not Congress — had the authority to enact such criminal laws.

Federal officials said that even if the high court rules Congress cannot require local officials to conduct background checks, the Brady law's five-day waiting period can remain in force.

of it. You can't ever replace that," Becca Dikeman, junior in animal sciences and industry, said.

The team members are on the road frequently and miss many classes and college life too, but they don't seem to mind.

"There are pluses and minuses on both. I miss college life, but yet you're only in school once, and you only get to compete on a team like this once in your life," Higbie said.

Dikeman said it was hard being gone so much, because she missed out on big events like football games.

"There have been times where I wish I could be doing this or that and when I first started I wasn't so sure. But the more I got into it, the more I like it," Dikeman said.

more and more stuff. It becomes more difficult to afford more printer cartridges and paper," said Jeff Alger, life sciences librarian and electronic resources.

He said there are four options. These are free printing, encourage downloading, downloading everything or chargeing for printing.

Charging for printing is the least popular option, but transferring the cost to the user is the easiest way to get the money, he said.

The decision will be made once the system is fully operational, Alger said. This should be in the first part of the spring semester.

It's the end of an era.

Student chosen to join national FFA board

LILLAN BEEBE
staff reporter

A K-State student in agriculture is taking the chance of a lifetime and a year off from school to serve as a student officer for FFA.

Brad Montgomery, sophomore in agricultural economics, leaves today for Louisville, Ky., to begin his year-long term as FFA central region vice-president.

The Board of Student Officers for FFA was announced Nov. 16 during the last session of the National FFA Convention in Kansas City, Mo.

"When they said my name, I could hardly believe it," Montgomery said. "I was in the second row, and I ended up hurdling some chairs, running up on stage and going wild."

Montgomery is one of six college students who make up the Board of Student Officers. They are all taking a year off from school to fulfill their duties.

"That's the beauty of FFA. It's not just a high-school thing. People can retain their membership for up to three years after they graduate from high school," he said.

Montgomery left K-State at Thanksgiving break and is taking an incomplete in all of his classes except Spanish 1. He will return to campus in spring 1998.

"It will slow me down, but this year is going to give me a unique perspective on agricultural industry," he said.

Life will be different not having to concentrate on school, Montgomery said.

"I will learn more this year than I would learn in a year of school," he said.

The student officers will spend the year traveling around the country serving as ambassadors for agricultural education. They will do presentations at state FFA conventions around the nation and work one-on-one with students, Montgomery said.

Montgomery

The FFA homepage (www.ffa.org) explains the FFA student officer duties.

It says officers will travel more than 100,000 miles next year and make hundreds of appearances.

"We have the chance to go to Japan and create a forum for discussion on international agriculture, and we may even have the chance to go to China," Montgomery said.

"It's going to be an awesome experience," he said. "I can't wait."

Montgomery said he also has a personal goal to fulfill, too.

"I want to have a chance to impact young people's lives," he said. "FFA is an avenue for success in life. It develops self-confidence and brings out personal strengths."

Montgomery said he's received an abundance of support from friends and family.

"I got tremendous support from the guys in my fraternity, Farmhouse, friends on campus and faculty," he said.

Student senator charged

■ Senator faces court date for lewd and lascivious behavior after neighbors said they saw him masturbating.

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

Student senator Chris Avila was arrested last week on a warrant for lewd and lascivious behavior.

"Neighbors observed him apparently in front of his window without any clothes on, acting in a lewd and lascivious manner," Lt. Herb Crosby of Riley County Police Department investigations said.

Becky Baalmann, sophomore in early childhood education, lives on the second floor of an apartment building near campus. Her window faces directly into the living room of the second-floor apartment in the opposite building.

Avila

She said she doesn't know Avila, who lives in that apartment.

"When he has his blinds open, you can see straight into his apartment," Baalmann said.

On several occasions this semester, she said she and her roommate saw their neighbor masturbating.

Baalmann complained to the police, who swore out a warrant and later arrested Avila.

He was held on $500 bond, which he paid. His court date was set for Dec. 11 with the condition that there be no contact with Baalmann.

The court record said the charge of lewd and lascivious behavior implied that the defendant would "publicly expose a sex organ or expose a sex organ in the presence of a person, to-wit; Rebecca L. Baalmann, who is not the spouse of the defendant and who did not consent thereto, with the intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desires of the defendant or another."

Avila, a graduate school senator and last year's Allocations Committee chairman, said he could not comment on the case yet.

If he is convicted of this misdemeanor offense, it will not affect his job in Senate, Senate Chair Aubrey Abbott said upon learning of Avila's arrest for lewd and lascivious behavior.

"Senators' actions outside Senate aren't any concern of ours," she said.

Ex-convict questioned in slayings investigation

SHAWNEE — An ex-convict was in police custody Thursday in the deaths of two women who were sexually assaulted and strangled.

James Watson Jr., 23, of Kansas City, Kan., was being held on a parole violation, Johnson County attorney Paul Morrison said. Morrison said he planned to charge Watson Thursday in the deaths of April Sima and Rebecca Carlson.

Watson had recently been released from the Kansas State Penitentiary after serving time for auto burglary.

Sima, 16, was found strangled in the Olathe home of her parents May 29. Carlson was found strangled in her Shawnee apartment Nov. 14.

Both women had been sexually abused, and their bodies were found partially nude.

A special metro squad was assembled to investigate the killings, which investigators said appeared to be committed by the same person.

The same person was believed to have been with both women around the time they were killed. No signs of forced entry were found at the Olathe home or the Shawnee apartment.

Watson was questioned Wednesday and then taken into custody and his house searched. His car, a dark gray Mercury Cougar, was towed from the city police parking lot.

Neighbors of Sima reported seeing a gold or silver Ford Thunderbird or Mercury Cougar

Brady law might not affect state

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

The Brady law that came under fire Tuesday might not have much effect locally.

Mike Kearns, assistant Riley County attorney, said he hasn't seen any changes under the Brady law.

"There has not been any increase in firearms use, but it hasn't gone down, either, as far as I can tell," Kearns said. "I still see people using fists, bottles and knives."

The law requires a five-day waiting period before the sale of a handgun. Local officials are required to do a background check of prospective buyers. Local officials can also find out if the buyer has a felony record, a history of mental illness or drug use, or some other problem would make the sale illegal.

Capt. Brad Schoen, Riley County Police Department, said he does background checks every day.

"I'm the guy who looks over the purchase requests," Schoen said. "We haven't had a large number of refusals, but there have been a few."

The checks take a certain amount of staff time. Even if the requirements disappear, Schoen said it would lighten the work load in that area, but they still have plenty of work to do.

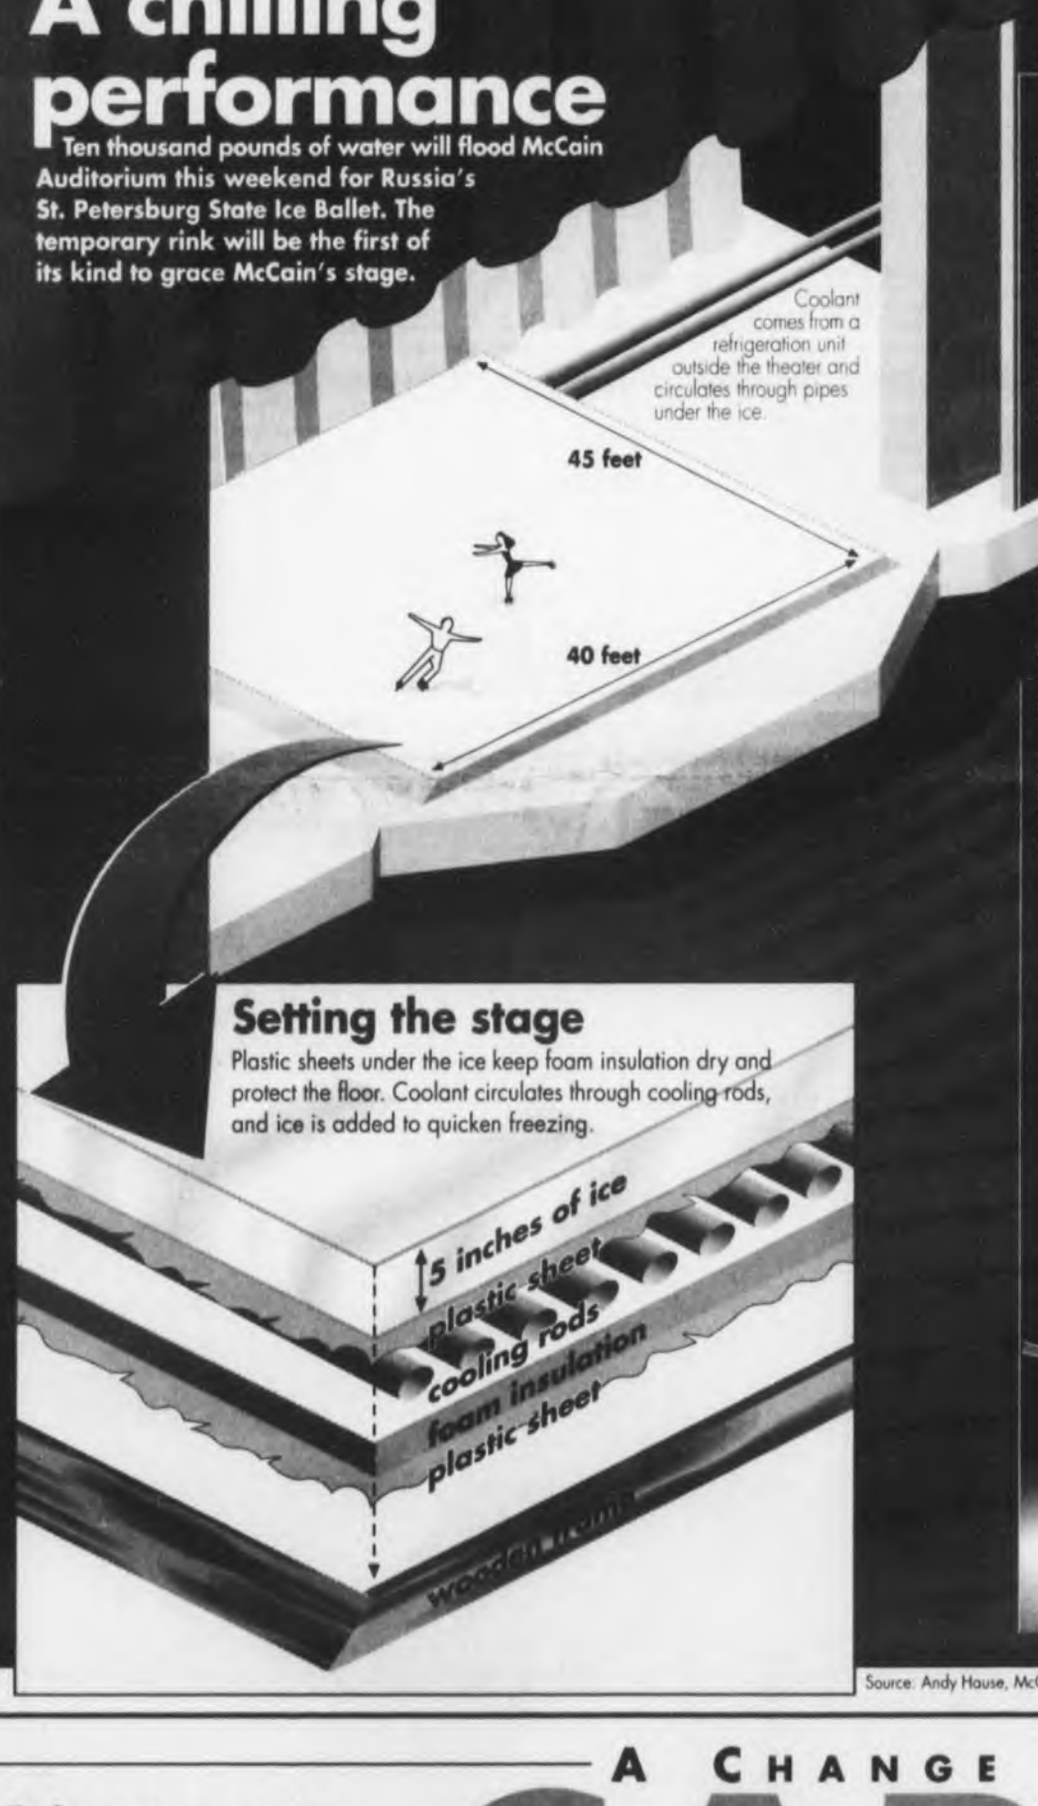
Senate seats limited to 60 after this term

NICOLE KIRBY
city/government editor

Student Senate capped the number of senators at 60 Thursday night.

Previously, the number of senators elected was based on the number of full- and part-time students in each college.



Because linear fees make it impossible to define students as full- or part-time, and because enrollment is expected to rise, the Senate Operations Committee wrote the bill to limit the size of Senate.

"We had two aims," Marcia Hellwig, special projects chairwoman, said. "The first was to curb the growth of the Senate, and the second was to decrease the size of the body."

A chilling performance

Ten thousand pounds of water will flood McCain Auditorium this weekend for Russia's St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet. The temporary rink will be the first of its kind to grace McCain's stage.

Story by Debbie Hollis

Chill out.

McCain will do just that when it provides 10,000 pounds of ice for St. Petersburg State Ice Ballet's performance of "The Sleeping Beauty" at 3 and 7:30 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

"We've never done an ice show before," Kristin Brighton, McCain marketing associate, said. "When we pull this off, we've opened McCain to a whole new art form."

Pulling it off will be a production in itself.

The Yontz Corporation, a company specializing in building short-term ice rinks, will help transform McCain's stage to an ice rink. Yontzmats, pads that circulate a coolant, will be laid down. Then a wooden frame will be placed on top and filled with the crushed ice.

"Once we get the initial ice in, we have to water and scrape it every 20 minutes from Saturday afternoon until the performances on Sunday," Terri Lee, McCain technical director, said.

McCain expects the stage transformation and ice ballet production to go smoothly.

"The ice show has consistently been playing for one-night stands," Richard Martin, McCain director, said. "They should have all the technical considerations worked out."

Martin first became aware of the production at Association of Performing Arts Presenters conference last year in New York.

The production is based closely on the popular Tchaikovsky ballet.

Martin has seen the ballet more than a dozen times. "I want to see how they've moved one genre into another genre, how they will make the ice spectacle as thrilling as the ballet," he said.

Tickets are available at the McCain box office, Manhattan Town Center customer service desk, the K-State Student Union Bookstore, Bramlage Coliseum and ITR at Fort Riley. Tickets are $28, $24 and $20 for the general public; $26, $22 and $18 for senior citizens; and $14, $12 and $10 for students and children.

McCain Box Office - 532-6428

Smoothing the ice

The rink will be busy Saturday night. Every 20 minutes water will be added until the ice is five inches thick. A Squeegie will be used to smooth each layer.

A CHANGE IN CLINTON'S

CABINET

Glickman Albright Babbitt Shalala Cohen Riley Reno Rubin Brown

Clinton names Cabinet post; other possible names revealed

STORY BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Settling on his second-term national-security team, President Clinton Thursday chose U.N. ambassador Madeleine Albright to be the first female secretary of state and Republican Sen. William Cohen to be his defense secretary.

A senior White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, also said Clinton had decided to name Anthony Lake, his national security adviser, to be the new CIA director. Sandy Berger, Lake's deputy, will move up to the top spot.

"I feel fabulous," Albright said as she left her home Thursday en route to the State Department.

Clinton planned to announce the choices Thursday afternoon. The appointments of Albright, Cohen and Lake would be subject to Senate confirmation; Berger's would not.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher and Defense Secretary William Perry are resigning. The decision means CIA director John Deutch is probably out of a job in the second term. He had been mentioned as a candidate to replace Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary, but aides no longer expect that to happen.

Though the appointments of Lake and Berger amount to a second-term reshuffling, the nominations of Albright and Cohen are trailblazing.

Albright, whose family fled the communist takeover of Czechoslovakia when she was a child, would be the first woman to be in America's senior diplomatic post. The selection of Cohen, the retiring Maine lawmaker, is in keeping with Clinton's promise to include Republicans in his administration.

Albright's selection comes amid mounting pressure from women's groups, who said Clinton's re-election was due in large part to his support from female voters. Both top choices reflect the influence of Vice President Al Gore, who supported Cohen and who needs female voters for his planned presidential race four years from now.

Other details about the president's new national security team:

● Albright, 59, is a naturalized American citizen, the daughter of a Czech diplomat whose family moved from Czechoslovakia to the United States when she was 11. As U.N. ambassador, she has been known as a hawk on Bosnia intervention and NATO expansion.

She is considered hard-working and outspoken, a Washington insider who came from the academic world to the Clinton administration in 1992. Some question her credentials as a strategic global thinker, and Clinton might have opened himself to questions on that score.

● Cohen, 56, is a Republican moderate who announced earlier this year that he was retiring from the Senate after three terms. He rose to national prominence when he cast one of the first GOP votes to impeach President Nixon and later played a leading role in the Iran-Contra hearings.

He established a reputation for independence in the Senate, a trait he demonstrated most forcefully in recent years when he became the only Republican last year to vote against the GOP plan to balance the budget over seven years.

● Lake, 57, is a reserved New Englander who has eschewed the spotlight as Clinton's national-security adviser. The author of five books on foreign policy, Lake served in the State Department in both the Nixon and Carter administrations. Before joining the Clinton administration, he had been teaching international relations at Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley, Mass., and raising 28 head of cattle on his farm.

As his name rose to the top of the CIA list, some aides wondered if Lake's mild manner was suited for the rough and tumble CIA stewardship.

● Berger, 51, worked in Lake's shadow as deputy national-security adviser but won Clinton's respect for his consensus building and organizational abilities. He is respected for his ability to straddle the intersection of politics and foreign affairs, but there are questions about his credentials for molding foreign policy.

Before joining the Clinton administration, he worked as an international trade attorney and partner at a large Washington law firm. Like Lake, he worked in the Carter administration — as deputy director of the State Department's • CANIDATES TO BE NAMED FOR U.N. POST. Several African countries are expected to submit names of new candidates for the top U.N. post after Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali suspended his candidacy in the face of unrelenting U.S. opposition. Boutros-Ghali said he remains an official candidate for re-election, and supporters were urging him to stay in the race. The United States cast the lone veto against the Egyptian in a first-round vote in the 15-member Security Council on Nov. 19.

A European diplomat characterized the decision as a face-saving move by Boutros-Ghali. By removing his name from active consideration, Boutros-Ghali would not have to see his support dwindle in a series of Security Council votes.

• COLOMBIANS SLAIN IN ATTACK. Assailants murdered 24 peasants execution-style Thursday in attacks on four villages in northern Colombia. There were no arrests and the motive was not known. Leftist guerrillas and private paramilitary groups are fighting for control in the region, often killing civilians.

Each group kills people they see as too sympathetic to the other side. In recent weeks, the paramilitaries reportedly have stepped up attacks on suspected rebel sympathizers.

• ASSAILANTS SLIT THROATS OF 10 IN ALGERIA. Assailants slit the throats of 10 people in a village just south of the capital, the Algerian government said Thursday. The killings, the latest in a nearly 5-year-old insurgency that has killed more than 60,000 people, happened late Wednesday night or early Thursday in Chebli, 12 miles south of Algiers. No one claimed responsibility immediately for the killings, and there were no other details of the government announcement read on Algerian radio.

• U.S. WARNS MILOSEVIC AGAINST USING FORCE. The United States warned Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic against violent suppression of the wave of marches and demonstrations protesting his autocratic rule.

State Department spokesman Nicholas Burns said Thursday the head of the U.S. diplomatic mission in Belgrade delivered a stiff message to Serbia's leader about the inadmissibility of the use of force against the people in the streets who are protesting peacefully. More than 100,000 people marched through downtown Belgrade Thursday, the 16th consecutive day of protests. Demonstrators are demanding the government recognize last month's municipal elections, which would give an opposition coalition control over the capital for the first time since the communists seized power in 1945.

• CAMPUS DRUG STING TAINTED BY ALLEGED OFFICER MISCONDUCT. Prosecutors dropped drug charges today against 10 California State University students, saying an undercover officer who lived among them tainted his investigation by providing alcohol to minors and having a romance with a woman student. The 23-year-old officer was not identified.

The officer lived in a campus dorm in a sting investigation that led to the students' arrests on marijuana charges last month. The drug sweep prompted angry protests from residence-hall residents.

Although charges have been dropped, the students still face administrative disciplinary hearings at the university, California State's Chico campus.

HANUKKAH HOLIDAY

• ISRAELIS PREPARE TO CELEBRATE FESTIVAL OF LIGHTS. Ushering in the Hanukkah holiday, Israelis lit the first of eight candles Thursday to commemorate a victory over the Syrians two millennia ago.

At the Western Wall, Judaism's holiest shrine, hundreds of people watched as the first torch was lit on a 6-foot-high menorah, or eight-armed candelabra. Those unable to make it to the wall were able to download the torch lighting live on the Internet.

Hanukkah is a family holiday in Israel. Schools close for the week, families go on vacation and there is a bounty of concerts, musicals and children's shows.

Bouyed by a strong economy, more Israelis borrowed the American Jewish tradition of exchanging gifts for the holiday. The United States and Israel issued a joint stamp for Hanukkah this year.

Hanukkah marks the victory of the Jews over the Greco-Syrian kingdom, which had tried to impose its culture and adorn the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem with statues of Greek gods. According to legend, when the Jews tried to rekindle the Temple's eternal flame, they found only enough oil for one day. But the oil miraculously lasted eight days.

In commemoration, Jews light candles at sunset for eight consecutive days.

Leaders meet, discuss rural funding issues

KARI BROWN
staff reporter

Political leaders from across the state discussed how Kansas will fund federal responsibilities, that will be handed down to state and local government, during the Rural Policy Symposium Thursday.

Policy makers addressed several questions and proposed solutions to the state's growing problems during the conference. The symposium in the K-State Student Union gave policy makers the chance to interact with officials from rural Kansas.

The conference focused on the devolution of the federal government. Devolution is the result of the federal government's decision to return the power of certain programs and agencies to state and local governments.

"We are about to embark on the massive restructure of government. The age of big government is over," Dan Stanley, Kansas secretary of administration, said. "Devolution is about responsibility and making competent decisions at a lower level."

Among some of the top issues were where the state fits into the devolutionized picture, and whatever the local governments in rural Kansas be able to afford the changes needed?

Sessions throughout the day included several perspectives on devolution. Other topics included welfare reform, taxes and how to cover costs of the newly reformed government.

Sen. Janice Hardenburger, R-Haddam, recognized a key problem facing many of the rural governments. Problems within the state include having certain agency responsibilities passed down to work with but no funding to make them affordable.

"The pressure is on us to turn this around," she said. "It all boils down to communities working together. We are helping people in need to solve the problems."

Most of the conference participants agreed with Hardenburger.

"It is going to take all of us working together to make things work," Mayor Warren Hixson, Colby, said.

To make the transition between federal, state and local governments smoother, constituents need to understand what devolution is doing.

"Costs are going to fall back on the cities. We are forced to make decisions based on what we have to offer in money," Glen Welden, city manager of Parsons, said. "Constituents must understand if they want something, then they must pay for it."

Possibly increasing taxes to provide the funds to pay for devolution concerned many of the participants.

"We are paying less taxes in Kansas than people in other states. However, property taxes are still too high," Charles Warren, president of Kansas Inc., said.

The biggest obstacle with the power change is the tendency to replicate federal government agencies on the state and local levels, Stanley said.

"We must think outside of the box for it to be successful," Stanley said.

GUN

Schoen said he thought handgun control was a bigger issue on the East Coast and the West Coast than in the Midwest.

"Here in the middle of the country we don't have to worry about the gun nut types," he said. "Life is different here."

Mike Weisbender, owner of Ole' Mike's Shooters Supply and Tackle in Manhattan said the Brady law is garbage. He said the law won't stop people from acquiring guns illegally. Weisbender said they just break in somewhere and steal them.

Furthermore, it creates problems for legitimate customers.

"I lose a lot of sales any time a customer has to wait five to seven days to get a gun," Weisbender said. "By now they should have a national criminal computer. It wastes a lot of time."

Mary Horsch, press secretary for Attorney General Carla Stovall, said what happens in Kansas depends on what the court decides.

"They may say part of the law is constitutional and part of it is not," Horsch said. "We really won't know until the court makes a decision."

in their neighborhood the day she was killed. Neighbors of Carlson said a gold midsize or larger car that may have been a Ford or Mercury was in her neighborhood the day she was killed.

Watson's father told the Kansas City Star his son had a connection to a Kansas City juice bar Carlson used to frequent.

Watson was arrested with eight friends in 1993 for stealing from cars and served a prison sentence.

The metro squad had earlier announced it would extend its work as fear about the possibility of a serial killer spread through the area.

The second aim was not met, because Senate voted to keep the number of senators at 60 instead of reducing it to 50. There are currently 61 senators.

The committee said it hoped decreasing the size would increase efficiency.

"Consensus decision-making does not take place in a group of 60, and it won't," Hellwig said.

She said consensus decision-making is the process of resolving an issue in which people talk about it enough so most are happy with the outcome.

Members of the opposition said they worried electing less senators would undermine Senate.

"By decreasing the amount of people, you are decreasing the representation," said Paul Colwell, Parking and Campus Safety Committee chairman.

Others said they thought the Senate already has a problem with not having enough diversity and decreasing the size would exacerbate the situation.

Some pointed out the number of greeks in Senate and said independent candidates would stand even less of a chance of getting elected.

Nicole Johnson, Faculty Senate representative and sorority member, said being greek was not an important factor in the elections.

"Whether you're greek or non-greek, you have to go out and let people know you are running," Johnson said.

The amendment raising the number of senators from 50 to 60 passed 40-12-1, and the bill itself passed 41-13.

Senate also amended its allocations process and voted to commend Brad Montgomery, sophomore in agricultural economics, for his selection as FFA central region vice-president.

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

K-State should follow Clinton's lead to diversity

President Clinton made history yesterday by appointing Madeleine Albright to the position of secretary of state, the first woman to oversee the State Department.

However, just being the first woman appointed to anything is meaningless unless the appointee is qualified. In Albright's case, her years of service at the United Nations, working with such issues as Bosnia intervention, and her knowledge from teaching at Georgetown University have groomed her well for the post.

It's not a sure thing, because Albright has yet to be approved by Congress. We encourage the Kansas delegation to the House and Senate to support Albright's nomination and duly welcome her to the international-policy arena.

Clinton's choice of Albright pays tribute to a person who, as the only woman on the U.N. Security Council, has held her own with international ambassadors.

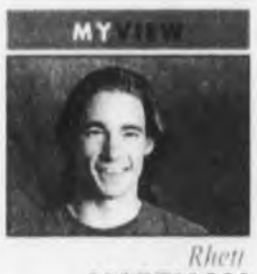
This ground-breaking event has given us a chance to reflect on our own local political and administrative appointments.

K-State's administrative and dean positions are overwhelmingly filled by men. What is this campus missing by not having more female voices in policy discussions? How many qualified women in academia are passed over for high-level appointments?

We encourage the University administration to bring a new vitality to the campus with more diverse appointments. This should not be accomplished through gender or race-based hiring schemes, but through recognizing not only ability and intellect, but an examination of all options.

Clinton has made a bold statement to the international community that a superpower like the United States recognizes the equal rights of both genders, enough to trust the country's foreign-policy decisions to Albright.

We hope his message has been heard around the globe and right in our own backyard.



WHY WE CARE

Madeliene Albright is the first woman to be appointed secretary of state. The University should also look for diversity in its appointments.

If I had ANY regrets, it's that I would have taken more TIME

MY VIEW

Rhett HARTMAN

With only one column left to write, I feel strings pulling at my heart for what could have been. For every column that goes on paper, thousands run unleashed in my mind. Sometimes I think I could have done better.

You see, that which separates me from my perfect column is time. I would love to take my ideas and develop them and develop them until I have nothing more to give (and I probably only say this due to the deadlines I had to meet).

I'm not alone.

Deadlines and constraints are everywhere. Do this or we won't give you a scholarship. Do that or you won't get a job. Cut your hair.

A life with enough constraints can turn one's lifestyle into a pressure cooker. The pressure has to be released, because if you have to live with these constraints, you pick up habits to eat away and release these pressures.

But pressure can be exciting.

It is this pressure that gives people motivation to reach their goals. History has shown how necessity is the mother of invention. But is pressure the best motivator to get things done?

People seem to let pressure tell them when to do something. That is, people get the slight feeling of, "Oh yeah, I probably should start working on that..."

But this is a response to pressure, and there's usually not enough time to reach the goals they set out to achieve. There always seems to be something more that could have been done differently — if there were more time.

With all of the causes never known, and the future always unforeseeable, our planning usually errs on the side that is too short. When told to live with a constraint and meet a deadline, people don't seem to prepare themselves for their goals, and they don't always understand the complexity of a situation.

> "When told to live with a constraint and meet a deadline, people don't seem to prepare themselves for their goals, and they don't always understand the complexity of a situation."

I set my watch five minutes fast, but that doesn't solve all my problems.

Unexpected things happen, and we cannot prepare for what we do not understand. This inexperience and lack of knowledge separates our expectations from the reality of what we achieve.

This separation reveals situations when pressure has taken over. Yet experience and confidence can balance everything out. If you have been through hundreds of interviews in your life, one more job interview won't freak you out. Your comfort and experience allow you to prepare and act so that you will achieve your goals.

But whenever something new is experimented with, inexperience heightens the chance of not reaching the goal. The more inexperienced one is, the better the chance of not getting what you want done.

This is becoming confusing.

How can happiness be achieved? Either you only do what you are experienced in, or you let go of wanting to achieve. Neither sounds appealing. On one hand you can never experiment, and on the other you have no ambitions or purpose.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

It would seem that there should be another way. I mean, are we, as humans, perpetually stuck in this rut, to be either too perfect or too lazy? It would seem to be more complex than this.

Human nature might be bent on being happy. Why can't we just be happy with being frustrated? Probably because it is not very healthy. Frustration and ulcers are common bedfellows.

But human nature can tell us something. Way back in simplified history, people were happy if they were not slaves. And then they were happy as long as their children didn't have hemophilia. Life was simple. Then came that damn New World.

Yeah, we got a cool symphony out of it, and some more monkeys, but was it worth the trouble?

I mean here is the perfect case of people trying to get involved in things they aren't ready for. The pressures have turned our lives into mismanaged, brow-beating, anorexic, nail-biting bits of confusion.

God help us.

Hmmm... Maybe there is something...

Check out next week's column for continued thoughts. Rhett Hartman is a junior in management information systems, and you can e-mail him at (rhetth@ksu.edu).

WAITING FOR my next door TO OPEN

MY

Sera L. TANK

I remember my first night in Moore Hall.

I had the thrilling realization that from now on, almost every decision I made was my own. I no longer had to be home by 1 a.m. I no longer had to hide my birth-control pills. And no one would tell me when I had to study.

Then I stared at the ugly blue, brick walls in Moore 504. I remember thinking four years was a long time. I was never going to get out of here.

Well, 4-1/2 years later, that first night doesn't seem far removed.

And here I am, on the brink of graduation, praying to any and all higher powers that I pass my Physical Anthropology final. (I don't exclude Professor Michael Finnegan as a higher power if that's what it takes to pass.)

The time has gone by so quickly. I feel like my Grandpa LaLoggia when I say that. But it really scares me the way time flies. Four and a half years, just like that. While we're at it, 22 years, just like that.

But I'm going to be brave. I'm going to be bold. I know the only reason I'm scared is that I don't know what lies ahead.

Graduation is an ending. And my grandpa always told me God never closes one door without opening another.

But some doors are scary and dark.

So, it's with great reluctance that I open the next door. It's the door that leads to the real world — that mythical place I've heard my parents speak of disparagingly, saying it was cold, cruel and unfair.

Friends and family look at me when they hear I'm graduating with smiling faces. They say, "How nice. Aren't you excited?"

No, I'm not. I'm scared. Mostly.

A part of me peeks through the key hole of the real world in eager anticipation. For in my heart, the real world represents a little bit of freedom, a little bit of financial security, more new challenges, more new faces, more adventures and experiences and maybe a soul mate.

Something inside me tells me that just maybe this could be my chance to assert myself, my chance to be a success, my chance to give a little bit to this world.

But most of all, it's my chance.

Mine to make or break.

That is what I'm heading into, but what I leave behind is just as important.

And that worries me, too.

I look at the ceiling in the Collegian newsroom cluttered with the signatures and words of wisdom from former Collegian editors, and I wonder what I'll be remembered for.

I'm not sure what I'll write on the ceiling my last day here. Probably a Winnie-the-Pooh quote.

But there's more I'm leaving behind at the Collegian than a newspaper and a job. I've worked here for three years. I've done everything from writing and editing to stuffing advertising inserts into the paper at 4 a.m.

My ego's a bit bruised knowing there will be a paper next semester. It can run without me.

I have real roots here.

I'm leaving the best friends I've ever had.

Except for the fact that we have a habit of shacking with each other, we're like a family. There are a few people I can't be in a room with for about four minutes before expletives start flying, but there isn't one person who's ever been on staff here who I wouldn't give anything to help out.

My heart tells me that I will always keep in touch with them. But my mind and past experience tells me that the phone bills will get too high, and we will lose touch.

So, what wisdom do I have for those of you stuck here for a few more years?

10. Don't be too anxious to leave. Enjoy your time here.

9. Don't put Physical Anthropology off until the last semester, when graduation relies on it.

8. Enjoy the college experience. It's not all about books and studying. There's so much more.

7. If you're here for a diploma, don't waste your money. If you're here for the education, you'll be richer for it.

6. High-school romances should remain there.

5. If you go to Lafene Health Center, get a second opinion. I'm not saying they aren't good there, I'm just saying, they aren't always accurate.

4. Pay your bills on time.

3. Have an open mind. You're in a place where ideas flourish. If you listen, you might get some of your own.

2. Hearts are broken every day, and the world doesn't stop because of it.

1. Temporary red hair color isn't red or temporary on blonds. It's orange and costs $100 to remove.

But what do I know? I can only tell you what I've learned. You'll have your own lessons to learn and your own doors to open.

Pant the Chant winners lacked spirit at basketball game

Editor,

As I was driving to the K-State men's basketball game Friday night, I was surprised to see a parade of cars leaving Bramlage Coliseum. While I'm not naive enough to believe there would be a sell-out crowd at the season opener vs. the UMKC Kangaroos, I didn't expect to see people actively avoiding the contest.

As I drove in I realized these people just participated in Pant the Chant, which was between the women's and men's games. I was upset to see this mass exodus, but I didn't give it much thought.

At the men's game, I was impressed with the size of the crowd. I was particularly impressed by the greek group that brought a large contingent. I realized they were just carryovers from Pant the Chant and they would be performing at halftime, but at least they were there.

But I was utterly appalled after the halftime performance when these performers walked out. This was the same group that won, supposedly the most spirited group. Once their moment in the spotlight was done, the group decided its precious time had already been infringed upon enough.

I can't imagine what was going through their minds. Was the game that ugly? It couldn't have been worse than their halftime show. They dropped three women.

I respect the time and effort it took to put together the routine. Due to that respect, I watched attentively and clapped politely when they finished. But the amount of work they put into it pales in comparison to the time the basketball team put into preparing for the season.

And the fact they couldn't stay to watch the second half of what turned out to be a solid outing by the Cats is ironic considering the only reason they were allowed on the court was to showcase their school spirit. I always thought school spirit was supporting your school through thick and thin. Apparently it's using school-sponsored events to promote your organization.

Two weeks ago 10,000 K-State fans laughed as University of Kansas fans streamed out of Memorial Stadium early in the fourth quarter of the K-State-KU football game. A week ago, in Boulder, Colo., I watched as almost all the K-State fans at the game stayed in the stands until the end, even though the temperature was below freezing and the game was through. Friday, I was sickened as I watched people pile out of the game early.

And I wasn't the only one to notice. From the Topeka Capital-Journal, Nov. 23: "Most of the students who came to the doubleheader to participate in the traditional 'Pant the Chant' contest left before the men's game tipped off. Those who stayed to hear the contest results at halftime departed then."

Congratulations. You really showed something Friday night. Was it school spirit? Purple pride? Nope. It seemed to me to be more of a self-serving ego boost that had nothing at all to do with spirit.

Policy Planning Staff from 1977 to 1980.

Aides said Clinton's thinking has solidified on other Cabinet posts, but no more announcements are expected this week.

Clinton's decision ends weeks of speculation, as candidates ran hot and cold with nearly every presidential meeting or telephone call.

Finalists for the secretary of state job included Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Georgia; former Senate Democratic leader George Mitchell; Richard Holbrooke, who helped negotiate the Bosnia settlement, and Thomas Pickering, former ambassador to Russia.

Finalists at defense included Nunn, Deutch, Deputy Defense Secretary John White and Deputy Attorney General Jamie Gorelick. Clinton also was said to be considering candidates from the defense industry, such as Bernard Schwartz, chairman of Loral Corp. and a Democratic donor; and Norman Augustine, head of Lockheed Martin Corp.

Albright's selection opens up the U.N. seat. Rep. Bill Richardson, D-New Mexico, is a candidate.

Clinton made his final choices alone in the White House on Wednesday night after the annual Congressional Ball. He telephoned chief of staff Leon Panetta, who was still at the ball.

White House officials began calling key lawmakers on Capitol Hill late this morning.

K-State begins road test

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

The K-State men's basketball team travels to Peoria, Ill., Saturday night for the first road game of the season against the Bradley University Bears.

K-State has faced Bradley only three times in history and only won one game. That game forced the Cats to bury Bradley in an overtime period in 1995.

Bradley (1-1) battled the then-seventh-ranked University of Michigan Monday night and was able to take Michigan into overtime where it lost by one, 74-75.

"Bradley is a quality team," Coach Tom Asbury said. "They have some quality players, and they are well coached."

Asbury said he hoped his team was ready for its first road trip of the season.

"Any road test will be tough, especially with these new guys," he said. "We just have to make sure to go out and play with a lot of intensity.

K-State is coming off its first defeat of the season, when it was handed a 74-59 debacle by Wichita State. The loss to the Shockers stunned the Cats, but Ayome May said they still must move on.

"It's in the loss column. We can't do anything about that now," guard Ayome May said. "We can't bring it to the next game."

The Wildcats struggled with their offense in the contest, but it was the Shockers' three-point shooting that hurt the Cats.

"We made poor decisions and entry passes inside," Asbury said. "But we've done that all along. That's nothing new."

Heading into their fifth match of the season, the Cats are still looking for that one person to bring to the team leadership and direction.

"The players select the team captain. I have nothing to do with that," Asbury said. "I don't care who leads as long as you go out and play with emotion."

Not only do the Cats need to maintain leadership on the court, but they also need search for a consistent shooter.

"We don't have that drop-dead shooter," Asbury said. "We do it by committee."

Asbury has continually used several combinations in K-State's first games of the season and said he would continue to do so until he found that right combination.

"We look for consistency in our lineup, but we probably won't get it," he said. "Right now it is most important for us to play with focus and concentration."

Pigskin predictions for the faint of heart

This column space is reserved solely for the purpose of venting.

• The Cowboys of the Night are at it again. Once again, America's team of criminals has given sports writers across America something to write about. Coming off Michael "the dope maker" Irvin's incident, Leon "Lett the drugs be" has now been suspended for a year for failing a drug test.

Unlike Irvin, this is not the first time Lett has tested positive for drugs. Nope, his sample didn't pass the tests last year, either, resulting in a four-game suspension. Lett appealed the suspension, of course, but the league rejected the appeal. Because of the rejection, the suspension will take place immediately.

Lett was having a tremendous year, one in which he would have been a Pro-Bowl selection easily. Lett could have helped his team to another Super Bowl win and a visit to the White House. But Lett couldn't wait. He had to make a visit to the Cowboys' so-called White House.

• Raise your hand if you really think Texas Tech's Byron Hanspard should have won the Doak Walker award, an award given to the nation's best running back. Anybody? Anyone? Didn't think so.

What in the world does Iowa State's Troy Davis have to do? He is the only running back ever to have rushed for 2,000 yards in consecutive seasons. None of the great backs have accomplished that. Not Gale Sayers, Earl Campbell or O.J. Simpson (although if he had, he would have probably denied it).

The only advantage Hanspard had over Davis is he averaged more yards per carry. But that advantage was minimal. It does not make up for the lack of yards, touchdowns and carries that Davis had.

• If Troy Davis does not win the Heisman Trophy, the award will become one of the biggest jokes in college football.

• James Brown, the hardest-working quarterback in the business, has proclaimed Texas will beat Nebraska by three touchdowns. Um ... James, what are you smoking? It's obviously not the good stuff.

• I just got off the phone with my own personal psychic, and she had some interesting things to say. If you're not looking to make some easy money this weekend, then you might want to skip this prediction segment.

Nebraska 76, Texas 3. Just before kickoff, Nebraska coach Tom Osborne is forced to suspend half of his team due to criminal activities. Fortunately, the Cornhuskers' waterboys take the field and pick up the slack. Longhorn quarterback James Brown proclaims in a postgame press conference that he said UT would score three points, not win by three touchdowns.

Kansas City 16, Oakland 0. Before the game, Chiefs defensive lineman Neil Smith receives a call from his family wishing him luck. Smith erupts because they did not call him 1-800-COLLECT. He takes his frustration out by recording eight safeties against the Raiders.

Dallas 54, Arizona 53. The Cowboys barely make it out to the field, almost having to forfeit the game. It seems it took a little bit longer to test every player's sample before the game. The Cowboys make it, though, and barely squeeze by the Cardinals, who are led by Boomer Esiason's 650 yards passing.

• Oh boy, another NBA season has started. Another season of traveling, trash-talking and dunking. Would someone please wake me up when the season is over?

• It looks as if Notre Dame will not go to a bowl game. Ha, ha, ha, ha! Sorry, just had to get that out of my system. I wonder how much grass Lou Holtz has pulled out of that field in South Bend in his coaching career?

• What in the world is Sugar Ray Leonard thinking, making a comeback in the boxing world at his age? Just like every other over-the-hill, has-been boxer, Leonard must need some quick money. But it isn't going to matter if Leonard cannot see the money.

K-State squares off with UTEP in Moscow

Coming off a tough loss at Ohio University, the Wildcats will see a familiar opponent today in the first round of the Idaho Tournament in Moscow, Idaho.

No, K-State (4-1) has not yet played the University of Texas-El Paso, but Coach Deb Patterson said the Lady Miners (4-0) have a game similar to that of Grambling State.

"The thing that makes this UTEP team dangerous is they're very athletic," Patterson said. "They like to spread the floor. They've got an athletic post player, and they've got a coupe perimeter player who can hit the three-pointer."

But the Cats have seen and defeated that athletic look twice already, from Grambling and Memphis. And with only three players listed at 6' or taller, UTEP will be one of the few teams K-State faces this season that will not have size on the Cats.

Because of the Lady Miners' athleticism, Patterson said she expects them to try to create their own shots out of the offense, rather than letting the offense work for them.

That means the Cats have to play 30 seconds of tough defense every possession.

"Against a team like that, you want to make them stand around and keep them from using their athleticism," Patterson said. "We'll have to vary man-and-zone looks and see which is more effective."

Going into the tournament, Andria Jones leads the Cats with 21.2 points per game. Brit Jacobson is averaging 17.8 points, and Missy Decker has 10.8.

Waiting on the other side of the bracket are Idaho (3-1) and Eastern Michigan (2-1). The Vandals, who play host this weekend, use an inside-outside game to set up their offense.

"Idaho is very similar to the Ohio team we just played," Patterson said. "They like to spread you out defensively. They have a point guard that likes to take it to the basket and a good post player they'll look to inside."

The Eagles, on the other hand, rely on a potent post attack to set up the outside game.

"They've got a 6'4" kid and a 6'3" kid inside, and their wings are 6', 5'11", 5'10". Their first thought is always to pound the ball inside, so our post defense has got to step up."

The Wildcats return home next week to play Wichita State Wednesday.

Yanks hero signs deal with Angels

Leyritz

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Anaheim Angels acquired catcher-infielder Jim Leyritz from the World Series champion New York Yankees on Thursday in exchange for minor-league players to be named later.

Leyritz, 32, hit .375 in four World Series games against the Atlanta Braves in October, collecting three hits in eight at-bats. His big hit was a three-run, eighth-inning homer in game four off Braves relief ace Mark Wohlers, tying a game the Yankees eventually won.

Leyritz hit .264 with seven homers and 40 RBIs in 88 games during the 1996 season. He appeared in nine post-season games, hitting .263 with two homers and six RBIs.

Leyritz was signed by the Yankees as a free agent in 1985 and played for them for all or part of seven seasons starting in 1990, never appearing in more than 95 games or fewer than 32 in a season.

His best years were in 1993, when he hit .309 in 95 games with 14 homers and 53 RBIs, and in 1994, when he hit .265 in 75 games with 17 homers and 58 RBIs.

Leyritz, who has a .266 lifetime average with 57 homers and 243 RBIs in 522 games, was the senior Yankee in service team following the 1996 season at five years, 126 days.

Costume designers set the mood

ERICA DUNCAN
staff reporter

Costumes aren't just for Halloween. Six K-State students work part-time as stitchers for the K-State costume shop. The students construct about half of the costumes for K-State theatrical productions.

The scale of the production determines how much work the costume department puts into it.

If the production is too time-consuming or too expensive, the department rents the costumes and then alters them to fit the actors, Dana Pinkston, faculty costume director, said.

The majority of costume patterns are designed within the department, Alison Funston, costume shop manager, said.

When looking for stitchers, Funston and Pinkston pay attention to people's ability to sew, patterning experience and craft ability. Because most of the stitchers are clothing and textile majors, they only work for a semester or two.

There is a lot of instruction on the costume construction for each production, from period to modern costumes.

Clothing and textile majors pay a lot of attention to finishes and to the interior construction, while theater costumes are constructed mostly for their outward appearance.

Funston combines her clothing and textile skills with Pinkston's theatrical-design skills to form a more perfect union.

The costumes are not disposable. They are reused and sometimes even rented out, Pinkston said.

Although the costumes are rented out, not just anybody can rent one.

The costume shop only rents them out to high schools, community theaters and theatrical groups.

The money raised from the costume rentals is usually used to help with the costs of equipment upkeep.

A large selection of costumes is put into stock and altered for future theater productions.

"The costumes are so expensive to build that we want to establish a stock of good, solid period costumes," Pinkston said.

The cost of costumes varies depending on the season selection of performances.

Sometimes Pinkston is able to shift funds according to what the show needs.

If the costumes are in stock, production will be inexpensive, Pinkston said.

"I look at three things: time, labor and budget," she said.

Period costumes cost the most to create, Pinkston said.

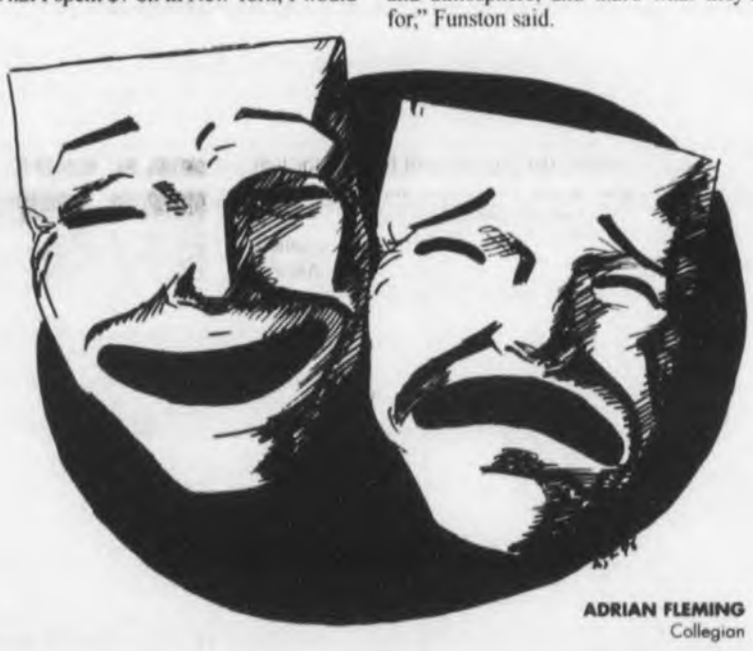
"Most of the period costumes deal with stuff the audience never sees, such as bodices and petticoats," she said.

When dealing with period costumes, the designer must also keep the minor details like shoes, wigs and hats in mind.

A period dress for last year's "Country Wife" required 12-25 yards of material that amounted to enormous costs, Pinkston said. The stitchers dedicated 12 weeks to turn more than $4,000 of materials into the costumes for "Country Wife."

Costumes in the Midwest cost almost twice as much as they would in New York, Pinkston said.

There is a greater fabric selection on the east coast and shipping costs to Kansas are outrageous, Pinkston said.



"What I spent $7 on in New York, I would have spent $20 on in Kansas," she said.

Pinkston's training has given her a broad-based knowledge of costumes and their historical periods.

"I always do research on all of the shows. It's never just a literal translation but a theatrical interpretation," Pinkston said.

Costumes are time-consuming and expensive and require a lot of research, but in the end they receive the recognition they deserve.

"They usually make the review and definitely get noticed. They create mood and atmosphere, and that's what they're for," Funston said.

The wedding is over, and it's time to celebrate.

A wedding is an important event in the lives of many people. However, one of the biggest decisions a couple must make is where to go on their honeymoon.

Several things must be considered before making a final decision. The first thing a couple should do is develop a budget and decide on their top three destination preferences.

Terry Pearson, owner of Kansas State Travel Service, said the current top three choices for honeymoons are Carnival Cruise Lines, Orlando/Disney World and Hawaii.

"Carnival Cruise Lines is currently the No. 1 choice for honeymooners," he said.

A seven-day trip costs about $900 per person, including the airline tickets. There are also cheaper four-day trips. One advantage to cruises is that all food is included in the price.

"You definitely get the most for your money when you go on a cruise," Pearson said.

Carnival Cruise Lines takes trips to the Caribbean, Cozumel and the Cayman Islands.

The Disney World vacation is the second-most popular choice for honeymoons.

A six-day trip runs around $600 per person, including airfare. The price fluctuates based on the couple's hotel preference.

The hotels on the Disney property are more expensive than those in other nearby areas. The Grand Floridian is the the classiest and most expensive hotel choice.

Disney also offers various packages. Some packages include unlimited passes to all of the theme parks, car rental, behind-the-scenes tours, breakfasts with Mickey and Minnie Mouse, and various other possibilities.

The third most-desired honeymoon spot is the Hawaiian Islands.

"A trip to Hawaii is a little more costly," Pearson said.

A seven-day trip, including airfare, would cost $800-$1,000 per person. Souvenirs can also be a little more expensive. There are also other flights, to and from each island, that would be an added expense.

Pearson said most couples honeymoon from May through August, and it is sometimes cheaper to schedule during the off-season.

For example, Disney World has a value period during the fall. All hotel prices go down during this time. The most expensive time would be the spring and summer.

Cruises also offer discounts and specials throughout the year.

The Poconos is a famous honeymoon spot. If couples are looking for heart-shaped or giant champagne glass hot tubs and private swimming pools in their rooms, this is the place to go.

"I've been in the business almost 20 years now," Pearson said. "And I've yet to send someone to the Poconos."

Most people want to go someplace where they can kick back in the sunshine and have no pressures from the real world, he said.

Museum to offer lithography class

ASHLEY CELLER
staff reporter

Instead of buying Christmas cards to send to people this year, the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art offers students a more creative way to express season's greetings.

The Beach Bum student membership group, which holds fundraisers and plans activities for the Beach art museum, is having a holiday lithography workshop from 1 to 3 p.m. Sunday in the activities room at the art museum.

Kathrine Walker, education coordinator for the museum and Beach Bum adviser, explained lithography as a print-making process that is traditionally done on a large stone from Germany. It is an expensive process, but at the workshop the lithography will be done on a paper-printing plate, in which a grease crayon drawing is reproduced in many colors.

"The reason we decided to have a lithography workshop is because many of the art displays at the museum are done in lithography, so we wanted to do a workshop that related to the type of art in the collection," Walker said.

In order to participate in the lithography workshop, students must either already be a member of Beach Bums, or must sign up to become a member, which they can do at the workshop.

Walker said there are only 25 spaces available for the workshop, so those who are interested need to call her at 532-7718 and make a reservation.

To join the Beach Bums, there is a $10 membership fee for the whole year and this pays for most of the group activities and supports the group's operation. Members also receive a 10-percent discount at the art museum shop.

Walker said most group activities are included in the initial membership fee, but the lithography workshop costs an additional $5 for supplies.

Those interested in joining the Beach Bums can obtain an application from the art museum, if they do not wish to join at the workshop.

"Many of the members of Beach Bums are not art students, it is a group for all students interested in art," Walker said. "Joining Beach Bums is a way for students to support the museum, and it is a great social organization."

Walker said the lithography workshop was the Beach Bums' idea, and they thought it would serve as a great study break for students during finals week.

'Mars Attacks!' offers another corny look at alien invasions

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
senior staff writer

Life has been discovered on Mars.

Water was found on the moon.

Jack Nicholson has a smarmy brother.

Would you believe two out of three of those statements are true?

Director Tim Burton's outrageously witty, corn-fest movie "Mars Attacks!" asks and answers the grand 20th-century question: What if Martians in flying saucers attacked Earth and the only person who could save us was Slim Whitman?

If you're expecting an answer, you had better hurry off to the cinema this weekend and see for yourself.

The movie, it's more of an epic really, has more stars and guest stars than an episode of "Love Boat." Could Burton have failed with a main cast of Nicholson, as both the president and a smarmy Las Vegas developer (yes, that's him), Glenn Close as the first lady (a delicious send-up of Nancy Reagan), Annette Bening as a spiritual guru who embraces the Martians, and Pierce Brosnan as a geeky professor with the answers to our questions?

The plot — could it get any simpler — involves an Altman-esque arrangement of separate storylines following the president and his top aides, including a killer military-general performance by Rod Steiger (with lines like "Annihilate! Kill! Kill!"), and a cross-country melange of ordinary citizens, such as Vegas singer Tom Jones, battling for their lives from the tyranny of the invaders.

Who saves the day? None other than a Kansas farm boy, played by Lukas Haas ("Witness"), and his grandmother, played by the Burton standby Sylvia Sydney ("Beetlejuice").

Burton filmed key Kansas sequences just outside of Burns, which is north of El Dorado, and while the genuine, metal grain elevator still stands, the silly donut shop on Kansas Highway 177 was blown to bits by the Martians.

Apparently, Burton and company consider Kansas full of trailer-park dwellers whose most important possessions included firearms and TV sets. Of course, this is funny because the entire movie is nothing more than a cartoon, full of make-believe, larger-than-life characters in wacky situations, backed up by Jones' ever-crisp rendition of "It's Not Unusual." It makes sense for a movie based on an old series of Topps trading cards to feel cartoonish.

With this premise, Burton is allowed to have as much fun as he wants. He even alludes to his last film whose subject was undoubtedly the worst director in Hollywood history, the subtly humorous "Ed Wood." "Mars Attacks!" was Burton's chance to make a Woodian epic, the sort of big-budget picture Wood could have only dreamed of making.

The budget surely went to pay for the neat-o computer animation that created the Martians, who are surely the funniest incarnations of an alien being since the whimsical cantina scene in "Star Wars." Their throbbing heads, buggy eyes, and knack for misunderstanding the intentions of Earthlings get them in all sorts of funny trouble.

If you were overly enthralled by the take-myself-too-seriously movie "Independence Day," Burton's farce could disappoint. It's one of those rare movies that knows what it is, enjoys it, and doesn't mind a little hip honesty once in a while. Squares need not apply.

It's final: Cats to play in Dallas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The rematch nobody except Florida wanted is official: Top-ranked Florida State will have to beat the Gators again, this time in the Sugar Bowl on Jan. 2, to win the national championship.

Florida State (11-0) beat Florida 24-21 in Tallahassee on Nov. 30, and Seminoles coach Bobby Bowden winced at the thought of playing Coach Steve Spurrier's Fun 'N' Gun offense a second time.

"You would think that if you beat No. 1 during the regular season, you wouldn't have to beat them twice," Bowden said. "But we will go into the Sugar Bowl more concerned with winning the national championship than who we are playing."

On bowl-bid Sunday, the rest of the postseason picture came into focus. The Fiesta Bowl matches No. 7 Penn State (10-2) against No. 20 Texas (8-4) on Jan. 1, while the Orange Bowl pits No. 6 Nebraska (10-2) against No. 10 Virginia Tech (10-1) on Dec. 31.

The biggest bowl loser was No. 5 Brigham Young, which saw an $8.5-million payday disappear when it was excluded from an Alliance game. The Cougars, 13-1 after a 28-25 overtime win over No. 22 Wyoming in the WAC title game, were passed over despite being the highest-ranked team available after the Sugar Bowl picked.

"I'm obviously disappointed," BYU athletic director Rondo Fehlberg said. "I think BYU clearly had a team and a season that deserved to be in the alliance."

BYU will play No. 14 K-State in the Cotton Bowl.

Roy Kramer, chairman of the Alliance and SEC commissioner, said the Alliance basically puts together the two highest-ranked teams available and the other bowls are free to select the at-large spots as they see fit.

After the Fiesta picked Penn State with the No. 3 choice, the Orange went for Nebraska with the fourth pick.

Keith Tribble, executive director of the Orange Bowl, explained his choice: "We tried to make a decision that, one, was going to get the highest-ranked team that we possibly can that was good for our community, that was able to put on a competitive game," he said.

Spurrier, meanwhile, was elated to get another shot at the Seminoles after the Gators won the SEC title with a 45-30 win over Alabama.

"We didn't think we'd be back in the Sugar Bowl after what happened a week ago," he said.

AN ENDING... WORLD AIDS DAY A BEGINNING

Week ends with ceremony

DARCIE MCCONKEY
staff reporter

It was a time to celebrate the lives and memories of AIDS victims.

People crowded into the Union art gallery Friday afternoon to witness the AIDS Memorial Quilt closing ceremony. The panels, which represented only a small portion of AIDS victims, were displayed during World AIDS Week.

Two new panels were dedicated during the ceremony, and a panel on the quilt was also spoken about. The families and friends of Benjamin and Ronald Harris, Kelly Baker and Tom Stamey were present, while Reita Currie, registered nurse and Lafene Student health Center educator, spoke about those victims' lives.

STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators displayed the panel the group had created.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, opened the ceremony by reflecting on the reason the panels were a positive force in AIDS awareness.

"This display was an example of our commitment to find a cure to AIDS, as well as help heal the hurt. It was also an opportunity to offer some sense of comfort," Fallon said.

Along with offering comfort to those who are grieving for loved ones, Fallon said the panels also give people renewal of hope and commitment to find a cure for AIDS.

"During the week, it was very emotional. I could sense tears of pain and loss. But I could also sense all the love and care that went into the human relationships. This truly was a celebration to the unique lives and gifts that have touched so many people," he said.

The panels will not only join the rest of the quilt in memory of loved ones, but they will also demand that many issues be acknowledged, Fallon said.

He said it is a cry for human justice, a cry for acceptance of the disease, and a cry for the support to eradicate AIDS.

Several people participated in the candle-lighting ceremony in remembrance of AIDS victims. Candles were lighted in memory, solidarity, love, repentance, hope, thankfulness and

Manhattan community makes strives to accept, embrace reality of AIDS

EDITOR'S NOTE: Ray's and Beth's names have been changed to protect their privacy.

Reality.

Ray's life is a lesson in reality.

Ray is a 45-year-old man who has lived within 40 miles of Manhattan his entire life. Ray is dying of AIDS.

Ray found out he had contracted HIV in 1991 from a woman. She died in 1992. His message is that anyone can contract the virus.

"Real people have this disease," Ray said. "No one is immune."

Reality. Straight, young, middle-class people in Manhattan have AIDS.

Ray said living with AIDS in a Midwestern town has been both a curse and a blessing.

"There are good people here," Ray said. "Some may be a little conservative and backwards, but they still do care."

Jan Trulson, a Regional AIDS Project volunteer, said the Manhattan community and surrounding Kansas towns are becoming more receptive to

Graduates must dig a little deeper in order to receive K-State diploma

CECILY RODRIGUEZ
staff reporter

Soon, hundreds of K-State students will close an important chapter in their lives. They will see four (or more) years come to an end as they walk across the stage of graduation.

But just as nothing in life is ever free, neither is graduating.

"Not only do we have to pay to attend school, we also have to pay to leave it," Amy Voorhes, senior in pre-nursing said.

First, there's the non-refundable graduation fee charged by the controller's office.

According to the K-State commencement instructions, this fee supports costs associated with degree completion, and students receiving graduate degrees can expect to have additional fees.

Then there's the cap, gown and tassel. These items can be purchased for about $20 and are found in the K-State Student Union Bookstore, or at Varney's Book Store until Friday.

If graduates are planning to invite anyone to share in the joy of their academic achievement, they can order announcements at the Union bookstore or Varney's. There are two options available.

If simplicity is your style, a package of 10 non-personalized, white paper announcements, blank name-degree cards and 20 envelopes can be purchased for less than $15 at the Union Bookstore or for less than $10 at Varney's.

For students who prefer personalized announcements imprinted with name, college and degree, a package of 25 can be purchased for just less than $40 at either bookstore.

• NAMES SUBMITTED FOR U.N. POST. Four prominent Africans have entered the race for the top U.N. job, and others are expected to join the contest next week after incumbent Boutros Boutros-Ghali temporarily stepped aside in the face of an unrelenting U.S. veto.

The 15-member Security Council will convene again today. The submission of four names Friday was the first time candidates other than Boutros-Ghali had been formally submitted to the council, which must select a secretary-general and forward the name to the 185-member General Assembly for ratification before the 74-year-old Egyptian's term ends Dec. 31.

• VMI ACCEPTS FIRST 4 WOMEN. Virginia Military Institute has accepted its first four female cadets, three months after its governing board reluctantly voted to bow to a U.S. Supreme Court ruling requiring it to admit women or lose state funding. The four women and the 94 men accepted to VMI thus far have until Feb. 15 to make up their minds.

• VERDICT IN YUGOSLAVIA. The Serbian Supreme Court ruled against opposition parties who say Slobodan Milosevic robbed them of an election victory in Belgrade, a verdict likely to ignite even more determined protests by thousands of demonstrators bent on driving Milosevic from power. The opposition said eight protesters were arrested over the weekend, making 40 in the past week. One of those arrested was badly beaten.

• MOTHER TERESA'S CONDITION WORSENS. Mother Teresa appeared tired, and her condition deteriorated slightly Sunday, as doctors tried to cure her pneumonia so that they could concentrate on her heart ailment. But the 86-year-old Roman Catholic nun has remained attentive to her charity work, meeting with nuns to give them instructions concerning her Missionaries of Charity order.

• 17 KILLED IN INDONESIA PLANE CRASH. A small plane crashed into a factory in northeastern Indonesia Saturday, killing 17 people. One passenger survived.

A 40-year-old man was being treated for serious injuries from the crash of the PT Dirgantara Air Service flight, the official Antara news agency reported. The pilot, co-pilot and 13 passengers were killed instantly when the plane crashed into a gas factory about two miles from the airport.

A young girl died on the way to the hospital, but it was not clear whether she was a passenger. One employee of the factory was killed, and three others were injured.

• ISRAELIS, PALESTINIANS TRADE ACCUSATIONS ON HEBRON. An Israeli official accused Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on Sunday of making new demands that would set back two months of negotiations over security arrangements in the West Bank town of Hebron.

Arafat's office, however, blamed Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government for holding up a Hebron deal by trying to change the Israel-Palestinian agreement signed by the previous Israeli government.

The Palestinians said they do not trust Netanyahu to carry out the rural withdrawals and want a timetable.

• KASSEBAUM-BAKER WEDDING. In a simple ceremony attended by their families and a few well-known friends, Sen. Nancy Kassebaum and former Sen. Howard Baker were married Saturday, the first time two people who served in the Senate have ever tied the knot. The bride, 64, will retire in a few weeks after serving three Senate terms from Kansas. Baker, 71, served three Senate terms from Tennessee ending in 1985. The 15-minute ceremony was performed in front of 80 guests. Aside from their families, guests at the wedding included former first lady Barbara Bush, former Kansas Sen. Bob Dole and his wife, Elizabeth Dole, former ambassador Robert Strauss and former secretary of state Lawrence Eagleburger.

Former K-Stater explains University, NASA projects

CHRIS DEAN
staff reporter

The far-reaching effects of K-State research were brought home Friday by Charles Layne, director of the Movement and Coordination Laboratory at the Johnson Space Center in Houston, Texas.

Layne, a K-State professor of kinesiology from 1988 to 1992, took time out of his speech on dynamic postural control during and after space flight to thank K-State and Brian Spooner, head of the division of biology at K-State, for their part in his research at the National Aeronautical and Space Administration.

During Layne's time at K-State, he began research on the effects of weightlessness on human movement. This research consisted of simulations conducted on board the KC-135 aircraft. The aircraft, better known as the Vomit Comet, flies in a particular pattern that creates weightlessness for a period of 22-30 seconds.

Layne measured specific body movements and how they differed between being a person in space and then back in gravity after being in a prolonged weightlessness environment.

"One of the things we study is movement coordinations," Layne said. "How do people adapt to weightlessness and after they spend four to six months in space, once they get back to gravity, how do they do?"

The data he compiled landed him a position at NASA, and his research is being conducted on Russia's MIR space station.

All original experiments were conducted by K-State graduate students. Spooner was the first person to test out the equipment being used on the MIR, which measures muscle movements and responses.

Layne's speech was attended by an audience of about 50 students and professors, and was sponsored by the Department of Kinesiology. It illustrated the results compiled from his experiments. Layne also showed video clips from the KC-135 aircraft experiments and video of the MIR astronauts conducting the experiments.

"When free-floating, you experience decreased muscle activation," Layne said. "The University of Austin, Texas, has designed a boot that applies a pressure pattern to the bottom of the foot, which encourages muscle activation."

Layne said that this boot is designed to slow the muscle atrophy that astronauts experience while in space by activating mechanoreceptors, located on the soles of the feet, that feed information directly to the spinal cord.

"What we are trying to recreate is the level of pressure you feel when standing," he said.

The difficulty with the experiments, Layne said, is that the data varies from subject to subject.

"After space flight, astronauts show decreased stability and slower movement, but that is not consistent across subjects," he said. "Everyone is impacted but in different ways, and it's hard to sort out the data."

Despite this, Layne said there has already been interest in applying his research to practical matters such as bed-ridden patients and physical therapy, where muscle atrophy can also be a problem.

Although Layne began his research more than five years ago while he was at K-State, NASA experiments have just begun within the last couple of years on the MIR station.

"I was so excited, because you go and listen with the headphones at ground control. It's real exciting," he said.

E-mail, privacy don't always go hand in hand

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

The vast majority of e-mail is seen only by the sender and the receiver, but that is not always the case.

"Most of the privacy comes from the fact that there is way too much for anyone to snoop," said Ken Conrow, interim director of Computing and Network Services. "It is and it is not private."

Most networks are not secure, so if people want to plug in, they can, he said. If someone is deliberately snooping at the network level, they can do so.

Most frequently it is mischance which results in e-mail's being read by someone other than the sender or receiver.

"If mail gets misdirected, it goes to sort of a dead-letter box, so it could be read by someone else," Conrow said. "Sometimes people will send us something as an example of what went wrong, and they will send the whole kit and caboodle, including their e-mail and the error message."

Conrow said courts can insist any record of e-mail be supplied to them, which means e-mail is not private in the legal sense. If a company systematically archives all the e-mail, then a court can support a request for e-mail.

"That is one of the reasons for saying that it is not private," Conrow said.

At K-State, back-ups are made on a daily basis, but not with the purpose of archiving e-mail.

"We are not organized to back up e-mail, and it would be a real job for anyone to pick out any e-mail," Conrow said.

One way to protect yourself is with Pretty Good Privacy. This is an encryption key that can be used to ensure a greater level of privacy. If e-mail users want to, they can download PGP from an Internet site, Ralph Wasmer, consulting manager for CNS, said.

You can tell everybody who sends you e-mail on a regular basis what your PGP key is. The PGP key encrypts your messages, Conrow said.

"The PGP message key is not a very long key compared to serious encryption," he said.

There are hundreds of sites through Netscape, and a search on America Online revealed 256 entries for PGP, he said.

"If they have a choice, they probably should go to the MIT site. I think it's the official one," Wasmer said.

TCI cutbacks to alter local origination programming

SCOTT PHILLIPS
staff reporter

Tele-Communications Inc. announced Thursday that it has reduced its nationwide corporate-field work force by about 2,500 managers and employees, which will affect local origination programming.

Local origination programming, such as city commission meetings, Zoo News and the Bill Snyder Show will temporarily be suspended. Also, programs that are taped, such as Crime Stoppers, will temporarily be suspended.

The primary provider of local origination programming for K-State is the Educational Communications Center. Officials there are still unsure about what programming will stay on air and what will not.

"As far as we know, we're still on," said Dave Deitch, head of operations for the ECC. "Until we hear otherwise, we are still operating our normal local programming."

TCI general manager Richard Cofer said these shows will be temporarily suspended because of the layoff, but other K-State programs will stay on.

"There will not be any impact regarding the cable television business as we know it, such as basic cable programming, answering calls at the cable office and so forth," Cofer said. "Programs such as Knowledge TV or Mind Extension University and other K-State programming will remain on television because of remote capacity, but local origination programming such as the Bill Snyder Show will not."

Senior executives at the national TCI office in Englewood, Colo., in addition to the layoffs, will incur salary reductions and freezes until the company meets its business objectives.

As part of its 1997 budget process, the company is also reviewing all expenses not directly related to serving its customers, such as employee-bonus packages, and to providing them with a quality product.

The layoff, which represents 6.5 percent of the company's total employment base, is considered by Cofer to hopefully be a temporary situation.

"Our local management feels very strongly in making every effort to make this situation a temporary one," Cofer said.

"How soon, what form and exactly what quantity this suspension of programming will be we just don't know yet."

OPINION

IN OUR OPINION

Decision to run article was not made lightly

The Collegian Editorial Board generally does not comment on its reasons for printing stories in the paper, although in the case of Friday's story concerning a student senator, we felt it was necessary to address some of the furor generated on campus after publication of this article.

WHY WE CARE

Friday's front-page story conveyed the facts as the Collegian knew them. Our policy has not changed, and we stand behind it.

First, the Collegian has a responsibility to report on public figures. That is why we report on student senators, administrators, K-State athletes and coaches, and community leaders.

When a student decides to take on a public role either on an athletic team or within the Student Governing Association, he or she takes on a role that warrants closer scrutiny than that of a private citizen.

SGA members are the student body's voice in significant legislative and funding issues when they work side-by-side with state and local lawmakers and University administrators to influence policies that directly affect you as a student.

It is not the intent of the Collegian to hold these figures to a higher moral standard, but simply to the law. The Collegian does not create news, but rather reports news relevant to its readers.

The Collegian cannot be held responsible for another person's actions. We are not out to ruin anyone's life, but individuals must take responsibility for their actions. Ultimately, in cases where arrests are made, they will face the consequences in a court of law.

Those directly involved in the story were given a chance to comment. Whether they chose to or not was their decision.

In Friday's article, although the subject matter might be considered shocking, we were reporting a matter of public record, not reaching for sensationalism.

The decision to include a photo was not an unusual one, because it is consistent with other similar Collegian coverage, such as our treatment of a coach who was arrested for driving under the influence.

There are bound to be varying opinions on this story, and there is no reason you shouldn't be entitled to feel compassion for both sides of the issue. The Collegian has not and will not advocate any side of this story.

We gave you the facts as we know them, and we will continue to do so.

In Our Opinion, an editorial discussed and chosen by a majority of the editorial board, is written by the editorial board. For information on who is an editorial board member or how you can become a member, contact Sera Tank at (karolyi@ksu.edu).

Looking back

Reader feedback leads to an examination of motives for writing

MY VIEW

Roopa
SWAMINATHAN

Retrospective.

That is how I am these days.

I am talking about the end of the semester. Not that I am not glad the semester is through. I am simply sad that just as I was getting into the flow of things, I am already writing my last column.

The past eight weeks I have written for the Collegian have been an eye-opener of sorts for me, and a definite learning experience. Going from the side of the reader to that of the journalist was a big change. A paradigm shift and a whole new perspective.

As a reader, and a very involved one at that, dashing off angry letters to columnists and editors each time I read something I felt did not match my point of view was a given. Writing my own column and receiving letters (hate mail!) has changed that a little for me.

I finally realized how tough it is for writers to state a point and stand by it, for there is always going to be someone, somewhere, who does not agree with it and will get upset because of that. And they write you and tell you that, too. Not that that is wrong. No way. Except as a columnist I have noticed something ... if people write to tell you they don't like something you have written, they almost always never write to tell you when they have liked your work.

Guess what?

I am guilty of the same. How many times have I been enraged enough to write something to the Collegian when they have infuriated me? But never have I really bothered to write when I have liked something. I guess now is a better time than any to remedy that.

I feel compelled to tell Jeremy Stephens exactly what I expect from my readers. I did not agree with what he wrote on ethnicity and never will. But now that I am over my anger, I understand and appreciate his point of view on the issue even if it is diametrically opposite to mine. I never did tell him that there were other columns of his that I really liked.

I never took time off to write and tell Page Getz how much I like her columns. I might not agree with most things she says. But I am her biggest fan as far as just her writing goes. Her raw energy, the sheer power in her words ... I think she is right up there with the best.

The responses I got from them or did not get from them have altered the way I think about things. There have been moments of triumph when I reached out to a few people after my first column. In turn, they reached out and touched me. The letters I got in which people felt they would at least think about the whole issue of racism moved me. There were some who actually wanted to meet me and talk to me about the issue.

But that really was the end of my short-lived happiness.

Because just as smugness was setting in, just as I started feeling all important, the next two columns brought me back to earth. When in one column I exaggerated some of my nonexistent virtues, I was told I was too full of myself. When, in reaction to that, I wrote my next column virtually slamming myself, there were those who advised me to take life easy or go see a shrink. And to think I actually thought I was being funny. I realized rather late in the day that only I thought so.

Bottom line?

You never win ... whatever you do.

Then there were some Indians who wrote to me saying that I was responsible for propagating the myth about India being a backward country through my column. That instead of using my column space to promote my country and its culture, I was in fact denigrating it. For someone who is fiercely patriotic and insanely proud of my country, these comments shocked me. They made me sit back and think. They made me realize what feels and sounds right to me may not sound the same to someone else.

But then there is the biggest dilemma of all writers.

Do you write for yourself or for others?

Then there were columns which many close friends felt were my best ever. But I got absolutely no responses to them.

I wonder — is it good to get responses or not?

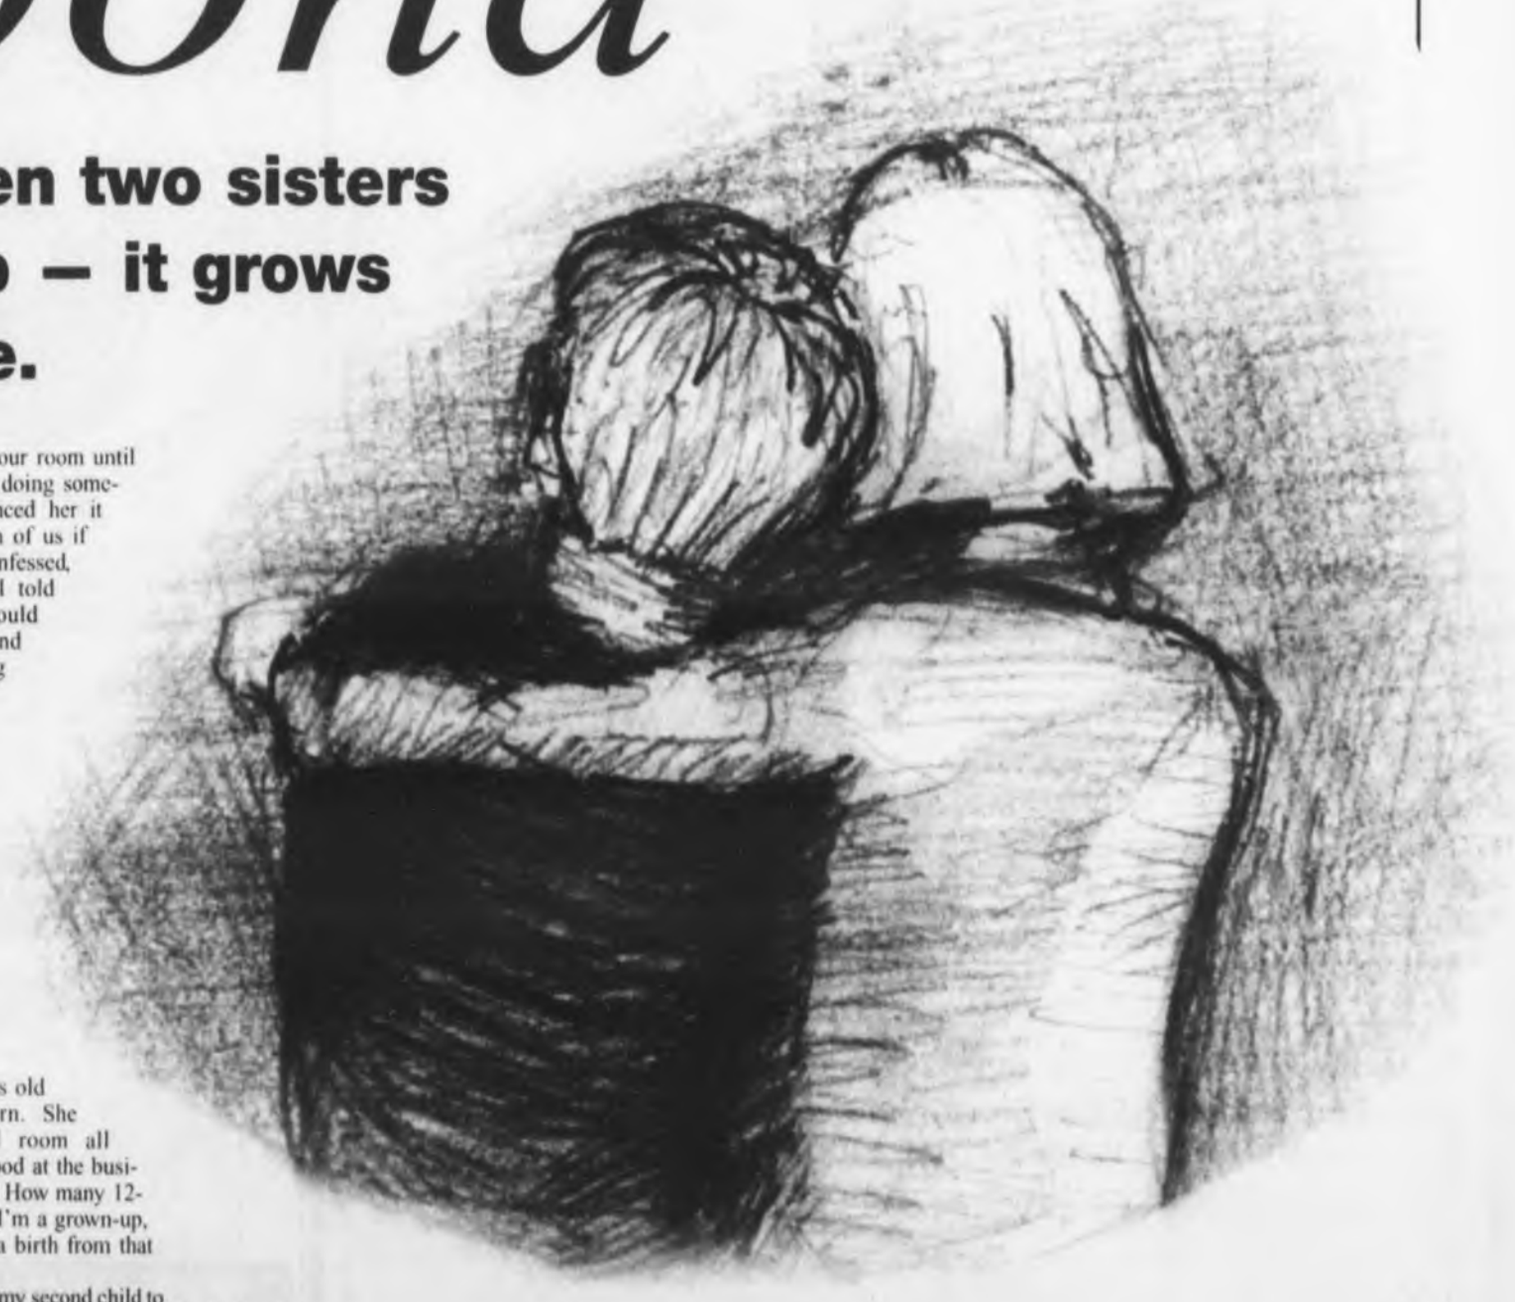
Is it better to make people respond or make them think?

I guess we will never really know the answer to that.

I normally play to win and have always tried to do the right things. Naturally, I don't like to be told I am wrong. One of my roommates recently told me I never change my point of view or ever admit I make a mistake. I am truly stunned by that. If that is true, I hope this column is the beginning of a change for the better.

As one of my all-time favorite writers, Richard Bach, says, "That's what learning is, after all: not whether we lose the game but how we lose it and how we have changed because of it and what we take away from it that we have never had before, and to apply it to a new game. Losing in a curious way then is winning."

I have made my peace with that.



I finally agree.

the bond

The connection between two sisters goes beyond friendship — it grows stronger over a lifetime.

I am still awaiting the results of my HIV test. I'm 99 percent certain I don't have the virus that causes AIDS, but you never know. I'm keeping my fingers crossed and making some pretty hefty deals with the gods.

Death would really suck. I guess it isn't the death part that sucks, it's the getting there. After a long, drawn-out sickness, death is probably a good thing. Once you're dead, it's over.

MY VIEW

Mary Renee
SMITH

My biggest fear is dying alone. I want someone to hold my hand and comfort me in my last hours on this earth. No one wants to die alone. Who will you chose to hold your hand?

I'll ask my sister. She'll do it.

Sisters have an unusual bond. It's a woman thing. I have rarely seen men have the kind of bond with their brothers as I see between sisters. I am the oldest of four children, two boys and two girls, so I have brothers. I love them very much, but even they know something is different with my sister Jennifer.

Jennifer is four years younger than I am. That seems to be a fairly average space between siblings. A good space, I think.

We have always shared a bedroom. Wait, let me back up. When we were small children, our family was incredibly poor. I'm talking government-cheese, food-stamp and free-lunch poor. We wore thrift-store clothes when it seriously wasn't cool.

When we were little, we didn't just share a room or a bed; we shared a beanbag to sleep in. It was a big day in our lives when a church donated a box spring for us to sleep on.

We fought like cats and raccoons until Jennifer's late teens. She has always been the neat and tidy type. I, on the other hand, have a more liberal attitude toward order and cleanliness.

Jennifer has also been the victim of my big sister power trips on more than one occasion. I remember the two of us being sent to our room until one of us confessed for doing something or other. I convinced her it would be better for both of us if she went ahead and confessed, despite her innocence. I told her Mom and Dad would reward her honesty, and we'd be outside playing before she knew it. (I was an evil child. Jennifer got even, though. She once zipped me up in a suitcase and left me there.)

Eventually, we did have bunk beds, but always shared a room. We shared a bedroom until the day I gave birth to my first son. Jennifer was there, too.

She was only 12 years old when Thomas was born. She stayed in the hospital room all through my labor and stood at the business end for the delivery. How many 12-year-olds could do that? I'm a grown-up, and I never want to see a birth from that end.

When it came time for my second child to be born, Jennifer played an even bigger role. My husband was in Saudi Arabia, and I needed a labor coach. She seemed like the logical choice. She had been through it all before with me. I wasn't going to have a baby without her.

The day of delivery came. The doctor entered the hospital room and told my mother he wouldn't allow Jennifer to be with me for the delivery. I calmly explained to the nice man in the funny green suit that if he didn't let her stay, I was going to get up, leave and have this baby somewhere else. (Keep in mind, a woman in labor doesn't explain anything calmly.)

The birth went perfectly. Jennifer is the greatest labor coach in the world. I will never have a baby without her. One of my most precious memories is looking up to see the tears in her eyes as she got her first good look at the baby and said, "Hello, Ethan."

Growing up in a less than functional family has made us more dependent on each other than normal siblings. We laugh about things no one else could ever understand. We cry for no apparent reason and know what is going on. We have survived together through what we could have never made it alone.

It seems fitting that when it's time for me to leave this life I will want to be with the person who helped me give life to two precious little boys. I hope that time is decades away.

I love you, Jennifer. Merry Christmas.

Ignored baseball program needs a better, newer stadium facility

Editor,

K-State baseball has been overlooked, and the program is in need for help. As a K-State baseball fan, I am unhappy with their current situation.

Frank Myers Stadium is an inadequate, outdated baseball field. Compared to other Division I baseball stadiums, we have a poor facility. The University of Nebraska has locker rooms, built-in restrooms and concession stands and is a beautiful stadium that holds 1,500 fans. The University of Kansas and Wichita State fields hold 1,320 and 5,000 fans. KU's stands right next to Allen Fieldhouse. Wichita State's is the best all-around field in the state.

Frank Myers Stadium has few if any of the accommodations that these other schools have. The bleachers were made for Ahearn Field House and then moved to Frank Myers Stadium. There have already been two incidents of people getting hurt due to seating arrangements. Frank Myers Stadium has no locker rooms for K-State players or visiting teams. The stadium is also equipped with portable restrooms and concession stands.

Memorial Stadium is the perfect location for the new baseball field. Memorial would be the perfect old traditional throwback stadium. Memorial is in the perfect location for a campus-centered field. Memorial Stadium will bring athletics back to campus. The stadium would still be considered a World War I memorial. Memorial Stadium would bring in more recruits, fans and business.

Now that Memorial Stadium is the perfect location, changes will have to be made. Remodeling would occupy valuable space. The East and West Stadiums only consist of eight classrooms. The loss of these rooms could be solved by simply rescheduling. More parking would be created for students and fans. The overall appearance of the campus would be an improvement.

Renovations to the stadium would cost money. Estimates have been from $1 million to $8 million for the transformation of the stadium. Students would have to agree upon a $10 increase on privilege fees. This would take five years to generate $1 million and this would just get the stadium in playing conditions. The process could be sped up through alumni donations and loans.

If K-State wants to have the premier all-around athletic programs in the Big 12 conference we must transform Memorial Stadium. We owe the baseball program the support that the other profit sports have received. Who knows maybe in the future, K-State will be in the college world series.

Columnist's treatment of 'class' raised questions of credibility

Editor,

It was with great excitement that I came home from work Wednesday, eager to tell my spouse and family of my lunch time epiphany.

Girls, girls, I called, as I ecstatically gathered my family around the kitchen table. It's all quite clear to me now, dear family, I explained to my wife and daughters. We are all the "victims" of a "patriarchal," "genocidal," American capitalistic conspiracy.

It says so right here, look, in Page Getz's well thought-out opinion column on stereotypes in the Collegian (Dec. 4). All of our efforts to raise a family of five on a college student's budget, and to earn between the two of us our four degrees, which, by the way, we have paid for and gone into debt ourselves to finance, have been for naught.

You see, I went on, we are really just "white trash," pawns to be used by the "homicidal" capitalists of America to shame our class peers and family for not accomplishing what we have.

A quick review of my family's Appalachian pedigree and my parent's educational achievement, or lack of it, quickly confirmed the awful truth of it all. Getz is right. Honey, I told my wife, I'm calling to decline that job I've taken with that obviously conspiratorial Fortune 500 company. I will not be duped by these manipulative capitalists, I cried as I picked up the phone to resign my position.

Well, this short little diatribe of mine, much like Getz's, is a bunch of nonsense. Well, all of it except for my "white trash" lineage and education. Her post-structural insight into the true meaning of a crass flier is simply not very insightful. I wonder if she holds the same contempt for Roseanne's irreverent use of the "white trash" stereotype, a person whom I'd wager she shares a very similar weltanschauung with, as she does the author of the rather crass flier in question. Her incorrect application of the word genocide is vacuous and denigrates the true meaning of the term. Her embrace of identity politics seems quite complete, as she deftly skirts her "white privilege" guilt with a skillful, and nicely utilitarian proclamation of her proud membership in the "victimized class," of America's "white trash."

Getz is right about something, however. Stereotypes do need to be challenged. As every good conservative understands, human self-interest disallows human perfectibility. And for that reason, serious societal problems deserve serious, honest and thoughtful discussion from all perspectives across our nation's cultural and political spectrum.

Stereotypes are not overcome by shrill and hasty confrontation with alternative stereotypes. See, for example, Newt Gingrich and the 104th Congress. It's just not productive.

In the meantime, I think I'll go ahead and finish my degree, take that awful capitalistic job I was offered and embrace the opportunity to improve my lot in life beyond that of my parents that this great nation has afforded me.

Coverage of senator was unfair, lacked standards and compassion

Editor,

This is the fifth year I have attended this institution. Never in those five years have I been so disappointed in the Collegian as when I picked up the paper on Friday and saw the article on the front page about the graduate student who was allegedly seen engaging in acts of self-gratification.

I am so disappointed, I cannot hardly put my thoughts on paper. Maybe this was done as a joke? I will admit I got a chuckle out of it myself, but this had no place in the paper, let alone the front page. This man will be persecuted all across campus. This man has not been convicted of any crime. It is the woman's word against his. If this is a truth, then I can only ask this girl one question, "Why didn't you close your window blinds?"

Don't get me wrong. I am not trying to pin any of the blame on this young lady. I realize the Collegian has a civic duty to report the news. This is hardly newsworthy. Finally, has anyone over at the newsroom ever heard of lawsuits concerning defamation of character? Maybe the journalist should try to implement a little tact from here on out. Any comments or reply on your part would be appreciated.

Editor,

I am highly disappointed in the manner in which the Collegian dealt with the troubles surrounding Chris Avila. It is my opinion that the Collegian took advantage of the unusual circumstances surrounding his case to create a sensational story.

I think it is inappropriate that the Collegian devotes a tiny column to catalog such serious crimes as DUI, battery and theft — all crimes with definite victims — and then elects to further embarrass a man who has probably been through enough already, and whose behavior really harmed no one but himself. This, coupled with the Collegian's habit of neglecting crimes committed by those associate bowl-bound sports programs, casts a suspicious, tabloidesque shadow on the Collegian's subjectivity and social responsibility.

Joshua Baze

Editor,

I would like to compliment the Collegian on its in-depth and groundbreaking reporting of the charges brought against Chris Avila. I'm so glad this wasn't reported with the other city/government news in the police blotter, as I might have missed it there. Besides, you couldn't have placed Avila's picture in the police blotter.

I do have a few questions, though, which you may wish to research and address in any future articles concerning this case. First, did Rebecca L. Baalmann ever attempt to contact Avila concerning his alleged actions? If not, why not?

Second, is there a law about repeatedly looking into another person's windows without that person's consent? If so, Baalmann and her unnamed roommate stated that they have broken this law. Has Avila filed charges against them?

Third, why wasn't there a prominently displayed picture of Baalmann and her unnamed roommate in addition to Avila's printed on the front page? If they are in the habit of looking into people's windows, I'd like to know what they look like so I may avoid them in the future.

On second thought, perhaps the Collegian should get past the easily available information and do some research before placing such a potentially damaging article such as this in the most prominent place on the front page, especially if you are given a week to write it. Then again, perhaps it was just a good excuse to use the word masturbating on the front page.

Editor,

Your decision to put Chris Avila's photo and story on the front page of Friday's Collegian was certainly tacky and decidedly cruel. If you have a future in journalism, it most likely will be with the National Enquirer or some such poor excuse for responsible reporting.

Phil Anderson
Department of Speech Communication, theatre and dance and faculty representative to Student Senate

Editor,

You know, I don't normally like to address issues this paper brings up, but I have read something that has literally infuriated me to the point that I have to say something.

Nicole Kirby's article on Chris Avila was tacky, unprofessional and borders on slander. I know for a fact that when she contacted Avila he asked her to wait until after the court date to run the article so that she would have all of the facts.

And what does she do? She runs the article anyway, with only half the story. What she neglected to mention was the fact that Avila hasn't even seen the police report, nor is he even aware of half of what is going on.

The only thing that Kirby has succeeded in doing here is taking a alleged accusation ... not proven, mind you, and possibly destroyed the reputation of someone who is honest, dedicated and hard-working. Avila happens to be the vice chair of University Activities Board as well as a senator, and he has done a wonderful job in both capacities. And I will go on record right now to state that I support Avila now and will continue to do so regardless of the outcome. After all, what he does in the privacy of his own home is nobody's damn business.

If this had been just your everyday John Doe, it would have gotten absolutely no coverage whatsoever. If the charges are dropped, I wonder if Kirby will sleep well at night living with what she has done. And the Collegian wonders why it is so unrespected on this campus.

Gee, go figure.

Michelle Cooper
chairwoman University Activities Board A&S Senator

Editor,

There was an peculiar mix of headlines on Friday's front page. Clinton's new cabinet, the Brady Bill and a possible killer loose in Kansas City. But masturbation? Is the Collegian's news staff so pathetic that it couldn't find anything more important to report?

Yes, it's disgusting that he put his neighbors through the show they claim to have disliked. But choosing to print the story on the front page shows pure immaturity on the part of the Collegian. I understand that the purpose of headlines is to get attention, but this time they've gone too far.

I'm sure the guy is already embarrassed about the whole situation, but the Collegian's choice to print his picture also only worsens it. Now not only has he had his life told to everyone on campus, but now he can't even walk to class without people pointing and snickering.

Even though he's an elected senator, this manner of reporting is still unwarranted. As the Senate chair said in the article, his "actions outside Senate aren't any concern of ours." So get over it. It happens. Who cares?

Stories like that are the kind of shit one could expect to hear in a junior-high locker room, not on the front page of a supposedly professional newspaper. Grow up.

Dean Draper
senior in secondary education and math

Editor,

Your front-page humiliation of Chris Avila appalled me. Since the man was in his own home, perhaps it is Becky Baalmann who should have been arrested for window peeping. Perhaps he was tired of Baalmann and her roommate constantly looking in his window and decided to teach them a lesson. Maybe he thought she liked what she saw since she seemed to spend so much time looking.

I think Nicole Kirby has an excellent future writing for the National Enquirer. Congratulations, Collegian, you have sunk to an all-time low (and I didn't think lower was even possible.)

It's official! Cats to face BYU in Dallas when they battle for Cotton Bowl glory

The official announcement has finally arrived. The Wildcats are going to the Cotton Bowl Classic in Dallas on New Year's Day.

Cotton Bowl officials announced late Sunday night the match-up for the 61st annual Cotton Bowl. They have pitted the nation's fifth-ranked team, Brigham Young (13-1), against the 14th-ranked team, K-State (9-2).

"To say the least, the Cotton Bowl is excited about the match-up this year," Rick Baker, executive director, said. "This is a great match-up for the Big 12, the WAC and for the city of Dallas."

Athletic Director Max Urick said he was pleased to have finally received the invitation.

"Nothing is a sure thing until you get the call," Urick said. "It worked out that the match-ups put us with the Cotton Bowl."

Baker said this was one of the more difficult decisions Cotton Bowl officials had to make.

"It was tough. We tried to look at all variables, and we wanted to pick the best match-up for Dallas on New Year's Day," Baker said.

Cotton Bowl officials said they think they boast one of the premier match-ups in college football with their bowl game.

"We have been in contact with CBS," Baker said. "There are certain names people attribute big names to. We hope the ratings in the future will be ties to the play on the field."

> "Quite frankly, we have had our sights set on K-State for the last couple of weeks. Our feeling was that we would wait until the selection show, and we were excited K-State was available to us."
> • RICK BAKER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

Baker said K-State had been on top of a very short list for some time, but when Nebraska was chosen by the Alliance, that opened the door even further for the Cats.

"Quite frankly, we have had our sights set on K-State for the last couple of weeks. Our feeling was that we would wait until the selection show, and we were excited K-State was available to us."

Baker also said K-State's fans had a big role in the decision-making process.

"Obviously, we have been impressed with the fans' enthusiasm and passion," he said. "Everyone knew K-State was high on our list. It was gratifying to see the passion of the fans about their Wildcats."

Urick said he was pleased K-State supporters were so enthused about the bowl game.

"They know how to go bowling. We're not complacent," he said. "It's not old hat, but it's nothing new. Dallas won't be disappointed when the purple people come down I-35."

The Cotton Bowl pits two teams against each other that have never had the chance to experience a Jan. 1 ballgame.

"This is a process that has seemed to follow the achievement of this football team," Urick said. "You do it step-by-step and block-by-block. This symbolizes another big step for Kansas State."

Urick said he thought this was a great match-up for K-State and said he hoped the Cats would perform well.

BYU originally was picked as a favorite for an at-large Alliance Bowl bid, but Alliance coordinators chose Nebraska and Penn State as their at-large contenders.

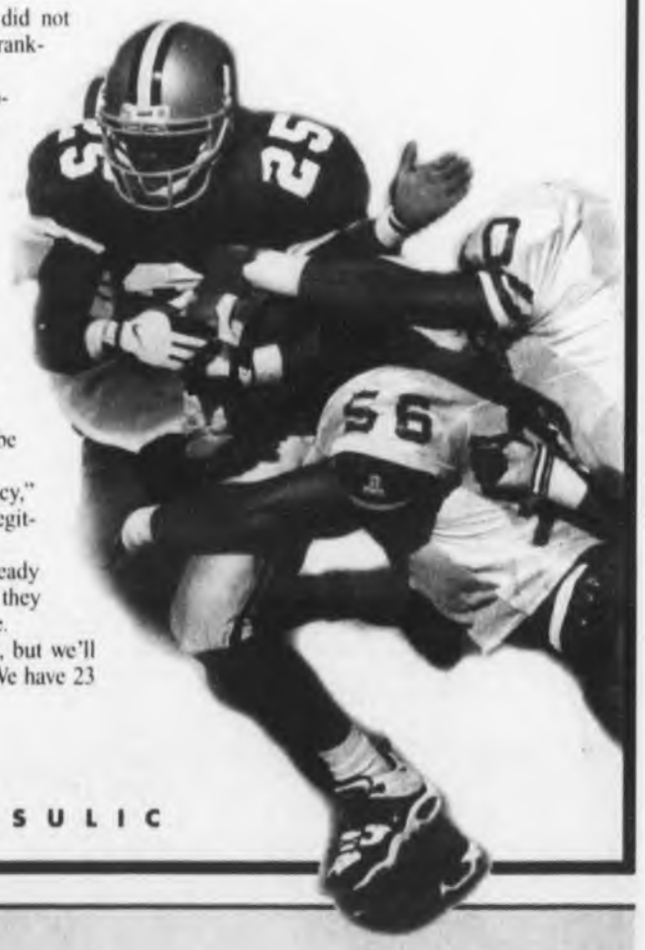
"We are very delighted. The fact is those bowls are bowls we have never been a part of," Rondo Fehlberg, BYU athletic director, said. "This is exciting for BYU and the fans."

Fehlberg said he was disappointed because BYU did not make the Alliance field this year after achieving a No. 5 ranking in the nation.

"It'll take us a couple of days to overcome the disappointment and get excited about Dallas. We have an enormous fan area," he said. "No matter where we go or who we play, we always have great regional support."

Fehlberg said there were a lot of upset fans and supporters who thought BYU should be an Alliance team but nonetheless were still pleased about the invitation.

"I don't want to minimize the disappointment," he said. "We were the longest of the long-shots, and these young men know they will be doing something that no other team at BYU has ever done."



Fehlberg said he thought beating the Cats would be somewhat of a justification for being in the Alliance.

"People have wondered about BYU's legitimacy," Fehlberg said. "We have to win the game to prove we're legitimate."

Ticket offices both at K-State and in Dallas have already started to process ticket orders. Baker said he hoped they could pronounce a sellout for the bowl in the near future.

"We'll have enough tickets for the initial onslaught, but we'll have to be careful," he said. "We all feel the pressure. We have 23 days before we're kicking this game off."

"But Texas upset Nebraska. Heck, we're looking forward to the game. We'll see if we can play a little better against them than last time."

In the non-alliance Rose Bowl, it's No. 2 Arizona State (11-0) against No. 4 Ohio State (10-1). The Sun Devils could win the national title with a win over the Buckeyes and a Florida victory over Florida State.

Nebraska stunned by Texas 37-27 in the Big 12 championship game, dropped out of contention for a third straight national title but still made the alliance.

"We feel fortunate to be sitting here talking to you today," said Nebraska coach Tom Osborne. "Our objective was to get through that game and we played a team kind of on a roll.

"And we didn't get it done. Everybody took it pretty hard, of ourse. I think a little time off will serve us well."

The Fiesta was locked into the Nittany Lions for weeks.

"We had the opportunity to host an anchor team that answers most of the needs of having an attractive game," Junker said of Penn State. "That's what we need to build a base for our bowl. And then we look at other teams. We thought it was appropriate Penn State was that team."

Texas qualified for the alliance as Big 12 champs, along with ACC winner Florida State, Big East champ Virginia Tech and SEC winner Florida.

The exclusion of the Cougars could create a stir, with WAC commissioner Karl Benson considering legal action against the alliance.

"I don't know anything about any type of action," Kramer said. "We are continuing our contractual agreement with the bowls."

And finally, Army may have beaten Navy 28-24 on Saturday, but the Mids (8-3) are off to Hawaii to play California in the Aloha Bowl. The Cadets (10-1), meanwhile, are off to Shreveport, La., to play Auburn in the Independence Bowl.

Dimel takes vacancy as Wyoming's coach

Dimel

JEREMY KELLEY
sports editor

Wyoming athletic director William Moon announced Saturday that Dana Dimel, K-State offensive coordinator, has been hired as Wyoming's new head football coach.

Dimel signed a five-year contract with the Cowboys.

"It's hard to explain how excited we are to attract an individual, and a football-caliber mind of Dana Dimel," Moon said.

Dimel is in his 10th season with the Wildcats and earned the offensive-coordinator spot after spending 1994 as running-game coordinator and offensive-line coach. Dimel has coached the offensive line that has led the way for two of K-State's 1,000-yard rushers — Eric Gallon in 1991 and J.J. Smith in 1994.

"Obviously, to receive an opportunity to coach a program so well-respected nationally is a great honor and a dream come true," Dimel said. "I want to create a family relationship among the Cowboy fans, the state of Wyoming, and the players and coaches."

Dimel played as an offensive tackle for the Wildcats for three years and lettered in 1985 and 1986. After his success with K-State, he was drafted and signed with the Minnesota Vikings in 1987.

Wyoming's current coach, Joe Tiller, accepted a head-coaching job at the University of Purdue to begin next fall. Moon said Dimel earned the vacated spot because of his hard work.

"Not only is Dana a great guy and an outstanding football coach, but he is an overachiever, and at Wyoming we love overachievers," he said.

Dimel said he thought his experience at K-State would prove worthwhile in Wyoming.

"Kansas State runs an offense very similar to what Wyoming has been doing. We do a little more two-back, but basically we have a wide-open passing attack," he said. "At Kansas State we have been noted for defense, and we will certainly stress the defensive side of the ball."

K-STATE'S DEVON RYNING tries to save the ball from going out of bounds in the second game of the Wildcats' match against Washington State. WSU beat the Wildcats 15-6, 16-14 and 15-13 Sunday in the second round of the NCAA Division I women's volleyball championship in Bohler Gym at K-State volleyball team finishes season, loses to Washington State

JOHN BERGGREN
sports writer

The K-State volleyball team's season came to a close Sunday as it lost to No. 9-ranked Washington State in three straight games, 15-6, 16-14, 15-12, in the second round of the the NCAA Tournament.

It was the Wildcats' first NCAA Tournament showing in school history.

The Wildcats fell to 26-9 to end the season, while Washington State improved to 26-5 with the win and will move on to play the third-round game of the NCAA Tournament against Loyola Marymount.

Secondary hitter Kim Zschau led the Cats with 11 kills in the match followed by middle blocker Abbie Brown with 10 and middle blocker Val Wieck with eight.

K-State's hitting percentage was a dismal .114 compared to Washington State's .243.

Even with the bad statistics, Coach Jim Moore said it wasn't that his team played all that badly.

"They played real well, and they beat us," Moore said. "Other than that, I don't really know what to say. I don't think we played that poorly."

Moore said part of the reason for the team's lack of success might be a lack of experience.

"We had Nebraska twice this year, and we lost to them for the very same reason we lost tonight," Moore said. "Good teams put a lot of pressure on people, and you have to learn how to handle that pressure with experience. I just don't think we have the experience yet."

But many of the players said they were not satisfied with just the fact that they made it to the tournament, because they had higher hopes.

"It was nice to make the second round," junior setter Devon Ryning said. "Washington is a great team, but we're not satisfied with just making it to the second round."

Brown said they had more of the same to offer.

"I was real excited to be here," Brown said. "We all wanted this really badly. I don't think we're satisfied with just going to the second round. Our goal was to make it further than this."

Brigham Young threatens lawsuit in aftermath of Alliance rejection

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Despite a 13-1 record, the No. 5 national ranking and the Western Athletic Conference championship, BYU was snubbed by the Bowl alliance Sunday.

Instead of going to an $8-million alliance game, the Cougars will play No. 14 K-State in the $2 million Cotton Bowl.

"I'm obviously disappointed," said BYU athletic director Rondo Fehlberg. "I think BYU clearly had a team and a season that deserved to be in the alliance."

So did WAC commissioner Karl Benson, but he soft-pedaled his earlier threats to sue the alliance if the Cougars, having won the league title, were excluded.

For now at least, Benson said, the WAC will lobby for changes in the alliance's selection process and eventually a national playoff.

"At this juncture a decision has not been made whether to file any type of claim," he said. "We believe it is important over the next month to focus on the success" of conference bowl representatives.

"You can say it's being evaluated, and will be evaluated over the next 30 days," Benson said.

Coach LaVell Edwards wasn't surprised by the snub. He said the alliance excluded the WAC when it was organized and probably never will pick a WAC team.

"It's almost like crashing a party," Edwards said. "It's just not going to happen."

No. 6 Nebraska (10-2) and No. 7 Penn State (10-2) were selected as at-large alliance teams even though they were ranked lower and had more losses than BYU.

Nebraska will play No. 10 Virginia Tech in the Orange Bowl, and Penn State will meet No. 20 Texas in the Fiesta Bowl. In the top alliance matchup, No. 1 Florida State (11-0) will play a rematch against No. 3 Florida (11-1), which lost to the Seminoles 24-21 on Nov. 30.

The alliance selections were based on several factors, including strength of schedule, TV appeal and fan support. All those factors apparently favored Penn State and Nebraska over BYU.

But Fehlberg said assumptions about BYU are wrong.

"What do they (Penn State) bring that BYU doesn't?" Fehlberg asked. "We fill the stadium wherever we go, we've got a national constituency, we're a national championship team. It's not as if we haven't been there."

> "I'm obviously disappointed. I think BYU clearly had a team and a season that deserved to be in the alliance."
> • RONDO FEHLBERG
> BYU ATHLETIC DIRECTOR

"At some point in time, college football is going to have be run by people who care about college football instead of other things," he added.

John Junker, executive director of the Fiesta Bowl, said BYU was seriously considered. But, he said, "We felt we needed an anchor team with the most positive force. Penn State was that."

Even though BYU won the 1984 national title, the program has never gotten the kind of respect that national powers like Penn State and Nebraska receive.

Critics pointed out that BYU played only two ranked teams this season — No. 13 Washington and No. 22 Wyoming. The Cougars lost to Washington, but beat Wyoming for the WAC championship on Saturday.

While he was disappointed that BYU was snubbed by the alliance, Fehlberg said the team was looking forward to the Cotton Bowl.

"We're getting to do something we've never done before," he said. "We'll be in a New Year's Day bowl game for the first time in the history of our program."

Want to go to Bob's?

A CAR PASSES by Bob's Diner early Saturday morning before pulling into the restaurant.

SHANNON FRACK, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education, gives Charles Chatman, a regular at Bob's Diner, a little good-bye kiss before leaving around 3 a.m. Beside knowing some of them, Chatman enjoys the company of college students. "It's a lotta fun," he said.

Interested in something different? Diner provides glimpses of various worlds

The staff calls the time between about 1:45 and 4 a.m. the bar run. Friday and Saturday night when the bars in town close down, Bob's Diner fills up with students seeking a cure for their late-night cravings.

Working nights at a diner can be difficult, but many members of the staff at Bob's said they appreciate the experience.

Leshea Smith, a waitress at Bob's Diner, worked during the day and recently switched to working nights.

"I love nights. To be honest it's a better crowd," Smith said.

CINDY O'BRIEN, waitress at the diner, gives Chris Collins, junior in hotel restaurant management, change back from his bill.

At 1:25 a.m., before the big run, there are few customers. An older gentleman reading the paper, a young couple finishing up their shared late-night dinner, and a handful of others make up the quiet gathering.

Despite the scarcity of customers, activity in the diner is high. Waitresses are busy filling salt and pepper shakers, stocking dishes and rolling silverware into bundles. The clanging of pots and pans can be heard from the kitchen. There is the feeling something is about to happen.

Country music blares each time the doors swing open and someone enters or exits the kitchen. News of the day is delivered from the television in the corner of the diner tuned to Headline News.

A bell cues the staff to the arrival of a new party as the front door swings open. A group of six students, including one riding piggyback on another's back, enters. The run has begun.

Less than 30 minutes later, the small diner is filled to capacity. The sounds of the empty diner are replaced by the laughter and conversation of more than 45 patrons crowding into tables and booths.

Charles Chatman, a regular at Bob's Diner, enjoys the invasion of this younger crowd on the weekends.

"That's what makes it interesting," he said.

The citizens of this late-night population are a mix of all pop cultures. Felt cowboy hats and shiny belt buckles mingle with baseball caps and T-shirts bearing greek letters and a woman in a black dress with a red corsage.

The smell of bacon and eggs sneaks under the cigarette smoke

Aria and concerto winners to perform on Tuesday at K-State orchestra concert

CHAD HELIN
staff reporter

The K-State Orchestra will feature the concerto and aria winners in their final performance of the year at 8 p.m. on Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

The aria award goes to an outstanding vocalist, while the concerto award is for instrumentalists.

Karen Doerr, aria winner, said these contests give students an unusual opportunity not common at the collegiate level.

"Usually I just perform with a piano," Doerr, senior in music theater, said.

"There is a whole different feel to the orchestra."

The concerto award was won by pianist Maria Jeffers, sophomore in music, who agreed that playing with the orchestra is a good opportunity to showcase her talent.

"They're a wonderful group of performers," she said.

David Littrell, orchestra conductor, said the orchestra will also feature student conductor Paul Chang.

"He likes to conduct and he's good at it," Littrell said. "He's really respected by the students."

ADRIAN FLEMING
Collegian

The concert will begin at 8 p.m. and besides the two feature pieces with the contest winners, the orchestra will play "Petite Suite" by Debussy, and "Firebird Suite" by Stravinsky.

▶ POETRY

Contest offers money, publication

MATT BASLER
staff reporter

The Second Annual Flint Hills Poetry Contest is now accepting poems.

Jonathan Holden, faculty adviser for the contest, anticipates another large turnout.

"We're hoping to get a minimum of 500 entries," Holden said.

Students do not have to worry about any particular style of poetry in order to participate in the contest.

"We don't put any criteria on style or length," Bryan Penberthy, sophomore in English and secondary education, said. "We take just about anything."

Because there are so many different types of poems, Penberthy said there are no restrictions whatsoever.

"We just throw them all into one big group," he said.

Penberthy said universities and colleges outside of Kansas had been notified about the contest and are invited to participate.

The contest has a $1 entry fee for each poem. Checks should be made out to the Flint Hills Poetry Society.

First prize winners in the contest get $150, while second place gets $100 and third place gets $75.

There are several rules that need to be complied with when entering.

Submissions must contain the author's name somewhere on the page with the submitted poem.

There must be a cover page with name, address, phone number and titles of submitted poems.

If there is no cover page, the poems will not be judged.

"We've been given $500 from the Arts and Sciences Council for the upcoming contest," said Holden.

Contestants who do not win any one of the three money prizes should not give up hope.

The top-75 poems will be published in the Second Annual Sunflower Anthology.

The deadline for submitted poems is Jan. 31. Winners will be announced and prizes will be awarded at the Dusty Bookshelf on Feb. 25, Penberthy said.

Those interested in entering the contest, send entries and checks to: The Flint Hills Poetry Contest, Denison Hall, Kansas State University, Manhattan, KS, 66506.

Dear K-State students,

It is never to late to make a professional change in your life. Do you have two or more years of college left? If so, there is still a chance for you to reap the financial benefits of becoming an Army officer. The Army ROTC program on campus offers 3 and 2-year scholarship programs for all students who are interested. So, if you are a student who has transferred to K-State from a junior college, a school that did not offer Army ROTC, or you simply did not consider Army ROTC during your first two years, this is your chance. Even seniors, juniors, or graduate students having two years remaining in their studies can participate!

Here is how the program works:

1) Attend a 6-week camp this summer. Receive approximately $800.00 - This camp is not required for veterans or NG/Reserve individuals.

2) In the fall, enroll in Military Science 310, and take this 3 or 4 credit hour course. Receive $150.00 a month for the next 2 years.

*This is all that is required to get you started on earning your commission as an officer in the Army. Remember there are still scholarships available!

You are at a point in your life where the decisions you make concerning your future are very important ones. To keep the maximum number of options open to you in today's job market, you should consider every opportunity to develop your leadership, communication, and managerial skills. That is what Army ROTC can do for you as you continue your education at K-State. Army ROTC provides excellent resume material in addition to all its other benefits.

I wish you success in whatever career you decide upon. If you think our program might help you achieve your goals, or if you have any questions, please contact CPT Barry Adams at (913) 532-6754, or E-Mail at b4adams@ksu.edu.

Sincerely,

Robert K. Kennedy

Forensics team earns 18 spots at nationals

MISSY SNODGRASS
staff reporter

The forensic team has qualified 12 people to represent K-State in 18 events at the national championship in April after the competition at Northwest Missouri State University.

Many members of the team placed after competing against 17 other schools.

"Judging where we are as of last year, we had 11 people in 31 events. We are well ahead of last year's case," said Craig Brown, instructor of speech and head coach of individual events.

"Right now, I have one more body qualified than last year," he said, "and 10 people are one event away from being qualified."

> "Just because they are qualified doesn't mean they will earn you points, but the odds are better in your favor."
> — CRAIG BROWN, HEAD COACH OF INDIVIDUAL EVENTS

The more people qualified, the higher the potential for points.

"Just because they are qualified doesn't mean they will earn you points, but the odds are better in your favor," Brown said.

Brown said K-State is presently ahead of most of the other schools right now.

"At this point, we start holding the qualified stuff. It gives others a chance," he said.

In the impromptu category, Chris McLemore, freshman in political science and biology, took first place followed by Toban Henry, freshman in history, in third place.

McLemore also placed first in persuasion with Christina Foust, junior in speech and advertising, in fifth place.

"It was a good weekend for me, but it was nerve racking because it was the first time I took my speech out. It sort of foretells how the rest of the year will go," Foust said.

The duo interpretation done by Chris Piatt, freshman in theater, and Ben Harvey, sophomore in chemical engineering, took sixth place.

The extemporaneous debate placed three K-State winners: McLemore in third; Wes Schawe, sophomore in math, in fourth; and Billy Burtnett, junior in speech and biology, in sixth.

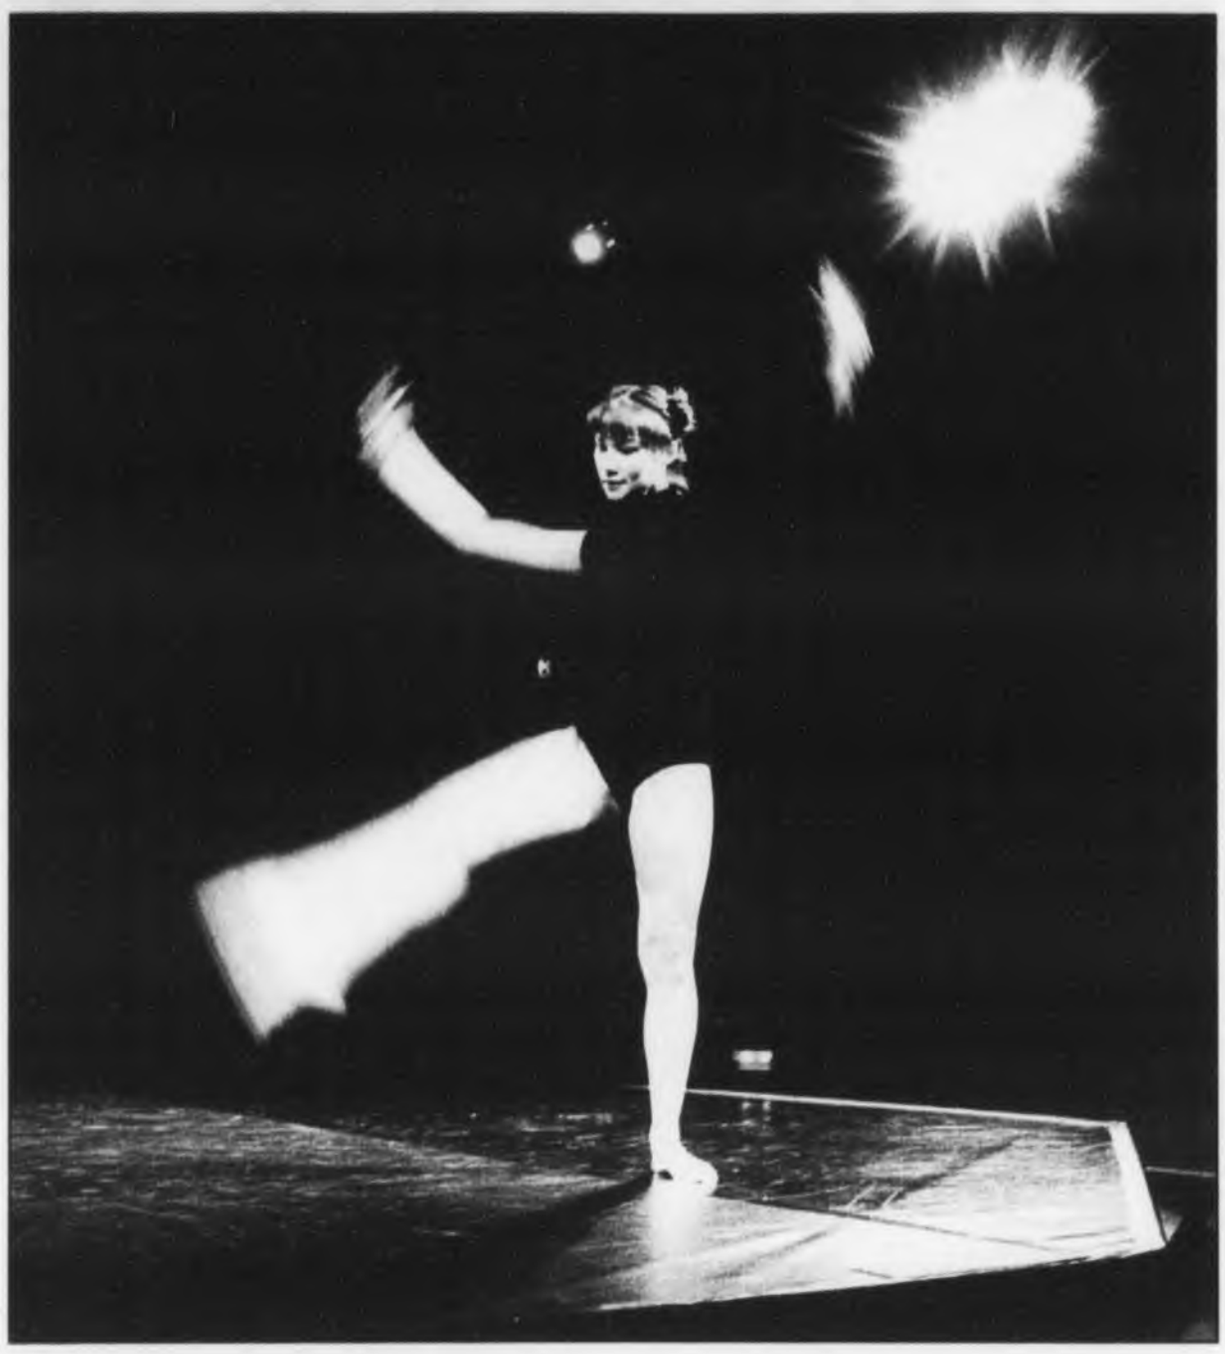
"McLemore is a freshman. He is figuring out what is going on and doing well," Brown said.

Clayton Johnson, senior in secondary education, took first in communication analysis.

"Clayton has been around, and you expect him to have success. He is a squad leader," Brown said.

Vanessa Vaughn, sophomore in theater, placed third in dramatic interpretation.

"The very first time I took out D.I. was at Nebraska, and I got first place and sixth the next day. Then I was always like seventh, so I was very pleased to get third in Maryville. It had been a long time," Vaughn said.



Overall, K-State finished second behind Illinois State University and ahead of Bradley University in third place.

"This is the first time I placed in three events. That was new for me. Normally I consistently placed in at least one," McLemore said.

McLemore qualified for nationals in one event.

"Now I can focus on the rest of the year — it takes off a lot of pressure," he said.

Brown said this competition was not just a few dominating seniors that contributed, but new and old competitors alike.

Original dance

FORTY-FIVE K-STATE students worked to produce and perform WinterDance '96 last weekend. The performance included selections choreographed and performed by guest artist Sean Curran. Curran performed with 12 K-State dancers for "A Musing Machine," an original selection choreographed by Curran.

Skating, ballet complement each other in McCain

CHARLE SIOUX CHARLETON
staff writer

Now I know what bad fairies look like. I saw some Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

The bad fairies swooped in during the christening party for Princess Aurora, which was the opening scene of St. Petersburg Ice Ballet's version of "The Sleeping Beauty."

The bad fairies accompanied Caraboose, the wicked fairy, who had been omitted from the guest list. The bad fairies looked like bad, black bats — on skates.

Caraboose was the stereotypical image of a witch, only with diaphanous clothing and a sparkly crown. She was wicked, but man, could she skate!

Skating was what really made the difference in this production. I have seen ballet shows and ice shows, but this surpassed anything I've ever seen. It was more than ballet and certainly more than ice-skating.

The set for the show was very detailed, and the lighting was exquisite. It all lent a dreamlike quality to the production.

With so many skaters involved, the number of costume changes that took place was amazing. Even more amazing was the ornateness of the costumes.

When the ladies wore their hoop skirts, it looked like they were floating across the stage.

One of the nicest aspects of the production was the choreography. No matter how many people skated on stage, it never looked crowded or messy. Everything seemed as smooth as the ice itself.

The occasional "schuss, schuss" of skate blades on ice served as a refreshing reminder of the ice underfoot.

These people really were performing a ballet on ice. Although the performers were working, they made it all look so easy.

You couldn't help but get carried away, and that's exactly what happened. The story was astonishing because it was told without words.

The skating was so lively it was easy to overlook the fact that the music was not live. Every move was timed to the exact second, with rarely a break in the action.

The play was divided into four scenes and opened with the christening scene.

The fairy who saved the day is the Lilac Fairy. She and the other fairies fairly floated when they performed, separately or together.

Although the Lilac Fairy could not undo all the damage, she prevents Princess Aurora's death.

One hundred years after the princess' 16th birthday, when she succumbs to Caraboose's evil wish, Lilac shows Prince Desire a vision. He follows the vision to kiss the princess awake from the spell. At the end of the play, we were all treated to a vision of the wedding between the prince and princess.

In fact, everyone wore fantastic costumes for the final sequence. When everyone came out for a final bow, they twirled on the dance floor like so many tiny tornadoes.

The audience was then asked to join hands in silent reflection, and a vocal solo was performed by Kathy Slawson.

Currie said she thought the display positively affected many people who viewed the panels.

"I believe everyone understood the reality of the disease once they viewed the display. This put a face on the disease. It also brought up awareness, because all of us are fighting this. We must share compassion for those who are living with AIDS," Currie said.

Fallon said he believed the display was an excellent way to share love, compassion and a commitment to cure AIDS.

"This experience has brought us together in a unique, special way. This enables us to make a testimony to the world about our commitment. We have been honored to participate in a week of sharing," he said.

hanging overhead. There is no alcohol served at Bob's Diner, yet the smell of hard liquor and beer pours out of the mouths of most customers.

The waitresses rush to take the orders of those already seated as a line of customers forms at the door.

Country-fried steak, hash browns, biscuits and gravy, and two eggs for $5.79 — the Big Country — is the special of the evening. During a typical weekend night, the cooks at Bob's Diner will prepare more than 30 dozen eggs, including omelets.

Mike Hays, sophomore in landscape architecture, and Brad Byron, sophomore in business management, haven't been to the bars tonight. They just came out looking for something to eat.

"I've lived here nine years, and I've never been here before," Byron said.

A nearby table of costumers overhears his confession and is visibly shocked.

Byron's friend proudly takes credit for finally getting him to Bob's Diner.

"I came here a few times last year and thought it was time I brought him," said Hayes.

An intoxicated customer at another table discovers the magnetic qualities of the silverware and is hanging a fork from the end of a spoon. Soon all the customers in the room have unrolled their forks and knives and are trying the dinner-table science experience.

By 2:45 a.m., the crowd has been reduced to a few small clusters of die-hard customers. The staff again begins to clean up and stock supplies.

Jerome Seidner, manager at Bob's, says the next crowd will be in soon.

"In a little while this place will be full of camouflage. It's hunting season, and the hunters stop here on their way out," Seidner said. "It was kind of slow tonight. Saturdays are more hectic."

the realities of AIDS.

Trulson's nephew, Michael, died of AIDS three years ago. Michael was living in California when he learned he had AIDS. Trulson said Michael's biggest concern in coming back home to Topeka was what his parents' friends would think.

"Our family was very lucky," Trulson said. "Most people were very loving and accepting."

Trulson said the key to the change in attitude is education.

"I think the community is becoming more aware that this is not just a gay disease," Trulson said. "It can happen right here to my child, or my friend."

Another dose of reality. Ray was attending K-State when he learned he had AIDS. Ray was about 30 hours away from a degree in hotel and restaurant management when he dropped out of K-State.

The danger was too great, not for the other students, but for Ray.

"Think about it. You're more dangerous to me than I am to you," Ray said. "All those germs and that coughing in a classroom of 200 people. My immune system couldn't tolerate that."

More reality. Ray will consider himself lucky if he lives just eight more years. He plans to stay in the Manhattan community close to family and friends. Besides his real family, Ray has found many new friends.

Beth, a Manhattan resident, lost her son in 1991 to AIDS. She now volunteers and attends the same AIDS support group as Ray.

"(Ray) is like my second son," Beth said. "I take him to appointments and try to help however I can.

"Although I'm doing something for him, I'm also doing it for my son. I know he would want me to do this."

Final reality. Real people die. Ray has lost six friends to AIDS within the past year.

Trulson said the scariest aspect of AIDS is most people refuse to accept that it could happen to them.

"Losing Michael was traumatic," Trulson said. "But the real tragedy is seeing people refuse to pay attention."

Without the key, people can receive unwanted e-mail. There is a way to stop the annoyance.

Tweed Ross, dean of educational support at the College of Education, said e-mail is never anonymous. Therefore, a person receiving unwanted e-mail can contact the server.

"The headers on e-mail always tell where the mail came from. Look at the header, and consult the mail service," Ross said.

Whether the server is a university or something like America Online, it probably has a policy regarding annoying or harassing e-mail, Ross said.

"I suppose they would take your privileges away," he said.

Ross said a person receiving harassing mail probably does not want to talk to the sender, even on the phone. He said it is more appropriate to contact the service and let it deal with the problem.

"After you've told the service, you might have to send them a formal complaint, so they have some type of documentation that they have been informed of the offending person," Ross said. "They have a responsibility."

Kansas Rural Center sponsors workshop

KARI BROWN

Sustainable agriculture is bringing people together around good food, fertile soil, clean water and revitalized rural communities.

This is according to information distributed by the Kansas Rural Center, the group that sponsored the Third Annual Heartland Sustainable Agriculture Network Roundup Saturday in the K-State Student Union.

The Heartland Network's goal is to let others see how sustainable agriculture works in today's society.

"We see how other people see our food system and how we farm and ranch. Hopefully, we do that in a way that balances profitability, resource conservation, rural-community development and offers a good quality of life on farms and ranches," Jerry Jost, coordinator of the weekend workshop, said.

The focus of the workshops was to help create profitable farms for future generations. Other sessions featured alternatives to regular farming, including intensive grazing, pasture-finishing and a waste-management/clean-water seminar.

"We are becoming a society of victims. We need to capitalize what's under our feet," said Joel Salatin, keynote speaker from Polyface Farms in Virginia. "We have compartmentalized our lives, and we've got people who know more and more about less and less."

Salatin focused on his own sustained-farming methods to create a farm he said his children will want when he retires. His purpose in speaking was to show farmers how to keep their children involved in agriculture.

"Farmers have become price-takers instead of price-makers. The worst thing you can do is pass a farm to kids that is not in economic control," Salatin said.

Salatin said he recommends creating diversity.

"Leave the farm as flexible as you can. If you don't, it is the most confining prison to put the next generation in," he said. "Children like diversity."

Salatin's farm in Virginia's Shenandoah Valley incorporates diversity through specific livestock and management procedures such as intensive grazing for cattle.

"Let the animals do the work," Salatin said. "American agriculture is in the material-handling business.

"It's get big or get out, and that is not necessary."

He said farmers should allow the children some type of responsibility.

"We need to give kids decision-making powers, so they will be ready to take over when we move on," he said. "Empower the kids with creativity."

Salatin also said to give future farmers a chance to develop their own enterprise within the family farm.

"We have created an agriculture that is family-unfriendly. We push kids aside, and then when they are old enough to help, they don't have any wishes to farm," he said.

Just hours after the K-State football team received word it would play in the Cotton Bowl, all-America cornerback Chris Canty was arrested for suspicion of driving under the influence of alcohol.

Canty, 20, was arrested at 2:53 Monday morning by K-State Police near the K-State Student Union.

Campus police Capt. Robert Mellgren said Canty was stopped for speeding — 32 mph in a 20-mph zone — and for a burned-out tail-light.

He was arrested for failing to appear on a Manhattan parking ticket, Mellgren said.

"When he was being arrested, the officer noticed that he smelled of alcohol," Mellgren said.

Canty

Mellgren said Canty did not resist arrest, and as far as Mellgren knew, he was cooperative.

A breath test showed Canty's blood-alcohol content was above the .08-percent legal limit, Mellgren said. He did not say how much above the limit.

About two hours after he was stopped, Canty was released from Riley County Jail custody on a $528 bond.

Canty could not be reached for comment on the situation.

Coach Bill Snyder said he was not fully aware of what happened.

"I cannot comment on the situation, because I don't know what the situation is at this point in time," Snyder said.

Snyder has generally handled discipline matters with his football team outside of the public eye. Earlier this season, however, Snyder kicked Lance Grace off the team. Grace was arrested for sexual battery; he has pleaded innocent to the charge.

Canty is highly touted by NFL teams, and there is speculation that he could possibly be leaving at the end of this season

On Sunday, Canty, a Jim Thorpe award finalist, was named defensive back of the year by the Touchdown Club of Columbus.

The junior sensation leads a defensive backfield widely regarded as the best in the nation.

Crop-judging team captures 3-part national-champion title

JANN STOUGH
staff reporter

This year's K-State crop-judging team accomplished a feat never done before.

Because the team's members captured the top three individual placings at every national contest, the team placed first, making it the national-champion collegiate crops-judging team.

Lance Gibson, agronomy instructor and coach, said this is the first time K-State has had a team win all three contests. In 1993, Oklahoma State University was the only other team to accomplish this.

The three national contests were the Kansas City Board of Trade contest, the Chicago Collegiate contest and the National Association of Colleges and Teachers of Agriculture contest.

The team members included Warren Willis, senior in agricultural business; Kris Young, senior in agronomy; and Chris Caplinger, sophomore in milling science. Ryan Reiff, sophomore in agronomy, participated as an alternate.

The contests tested the team's skills in grain grading, seed analysis, and plant and seed identification.

Gibson said for the grading section of the contest, each contestant must assign a grade of one to four or five for eight samples.

The second part of the contest was the seed-analysis section.

"The analysis part of the contest is like when you buy a bag of lawn seed, it isn't pure lawn seed. They have to go through and list

Manhattan airport gets thumbs-up

AMY LAGRONE
staff reporter

Kansas airports are crumbling.

Many communities rely on their airports as a source of health services and economic growth.

The runways at many Kansas airports are falling apart, and there is no money to repair them. This is a problem for the surrounding communities, because the condition of the runways results in reduced airport usage.

For about two years, two K-State faculty members and a doctoral student have been analyzing the deterioration of Kansas airports.

Michael Babcock, professor of economics; Eugene Russell, professor of civil engineering; and Marvin Prater, graduate student in economics, have been working together on a study funded by the Kansas Department of Transportation.

"Many Kansas general-aviation airport facilities do not meet the Federal Aviation Administration's design standards applicable to either current demand or what we forecast for the future," Babcock said.

He said the larger airports with the most air traffic receive continuous funding from the Federal Airport and Airway Trust Fund. The smaller airports, like those in many rural Kansas towns, do not receive money from this fund.

Babcock said many small towns are desperately seeking help. They are unable to attract new businesses, and they have reduced access to medical assistance. This is hard on the communities, because they might depend on doctors who fly in from other cities.

Kansas companies could lose millions of dollars if the airports they use are eventually shut down.

Manhattan Municipal Airport checks out pretty well.

The terminal, which used to be a disaster, is being upgraded, Prater said.

The new terminal will be dedicated Friday, and there will be an open house for the public at 9 a.m.

Court to hear Kansas sexual predator case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Leroy Hendricks had a way of attracting kids. They'd gather to watch him fly his remote-controlled airplane in a park. Sometimes, he'd buy them illicit treats, like cigarettes and chewing tobacco.

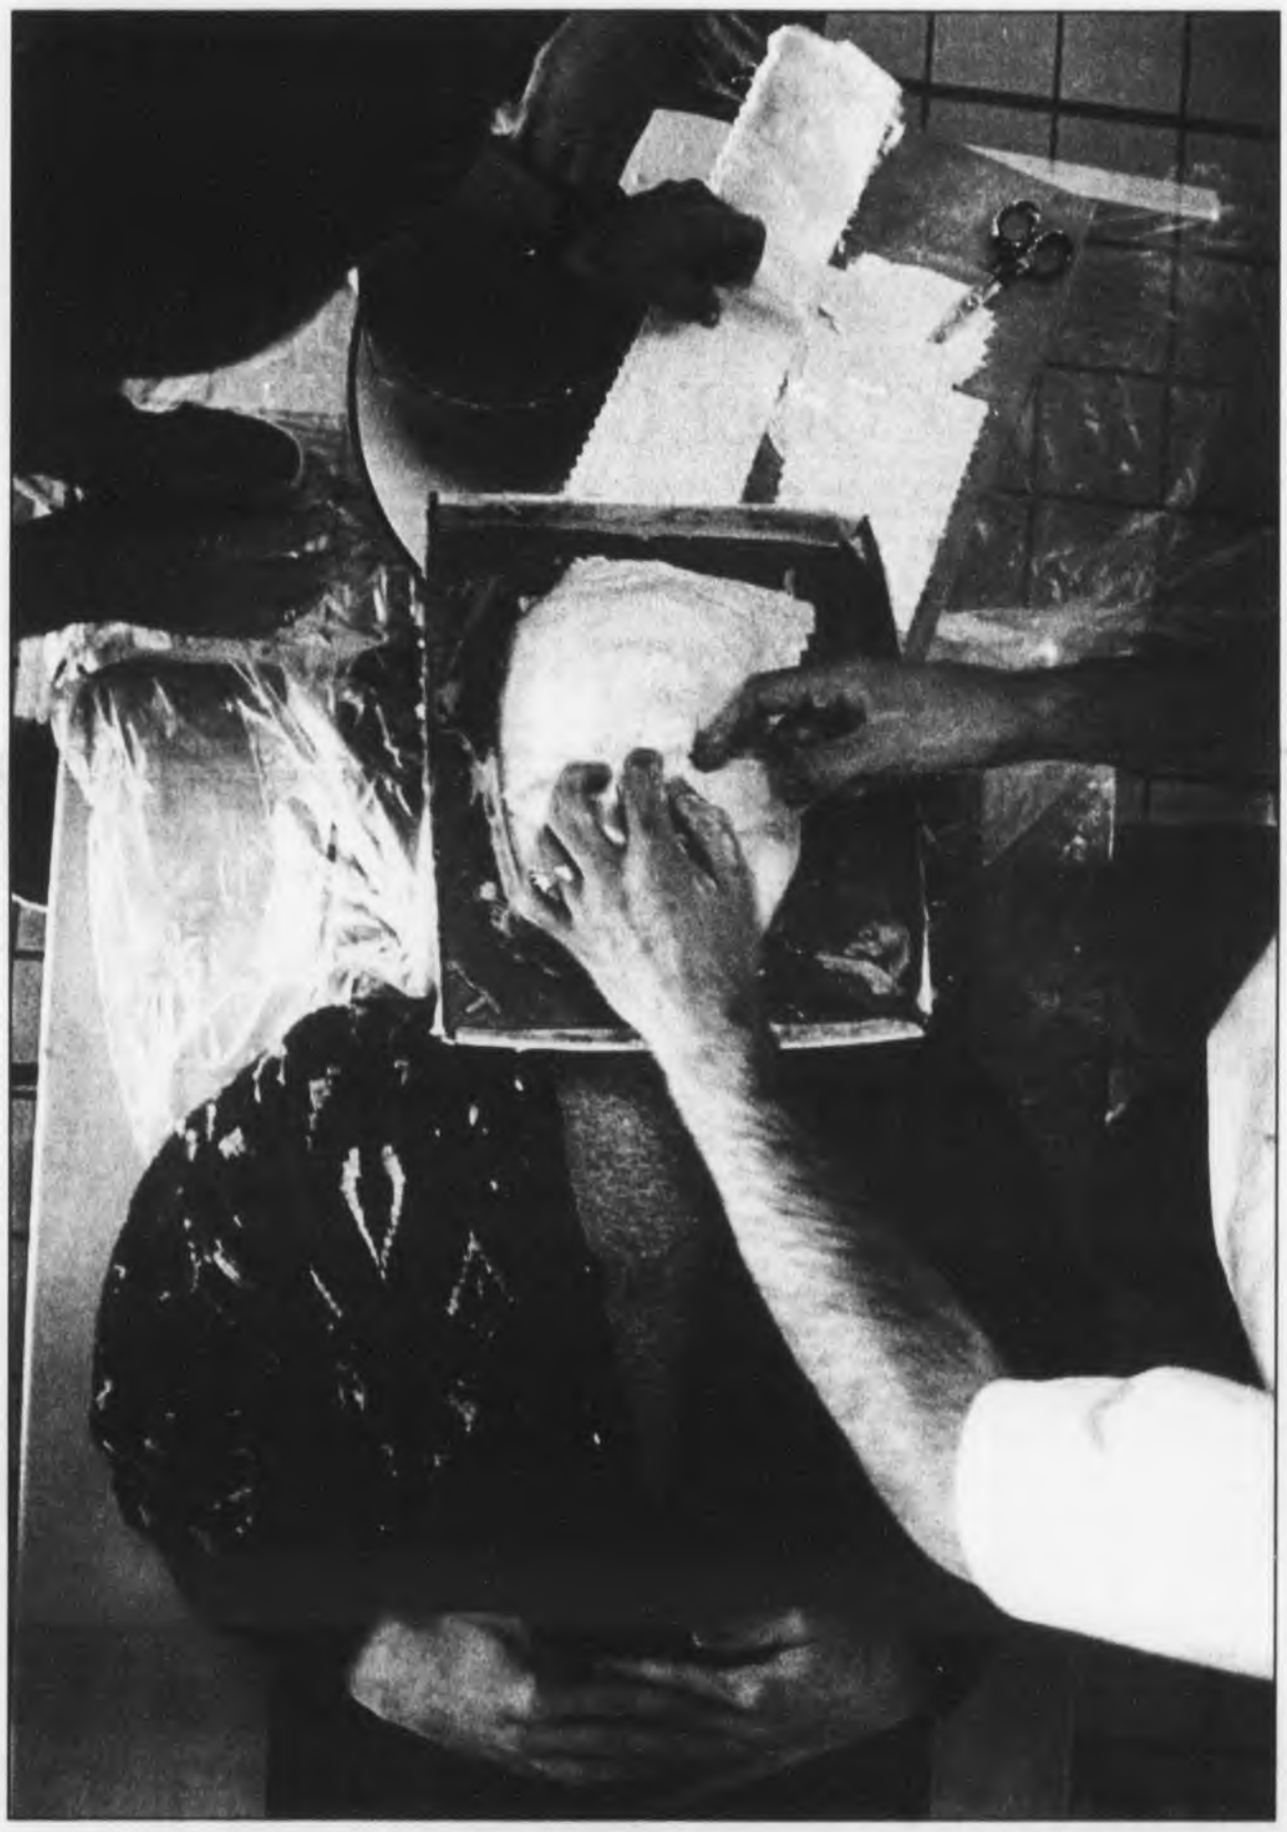
At some point, he started molesting them. And he says only his death will guarantee that he stops.

Now the 62-year-old former carnival worker is at the center of a closely watched constitutional battle that the U.S. Supreme Court will take up Tuesday.

The question is whether states may confine sexually violent predators after their prison terms are completed. Kansas law allows it, if a prisoner is diagnosed with a personality disorder or mental abnormality that makes them a threat to sexually prey on children.

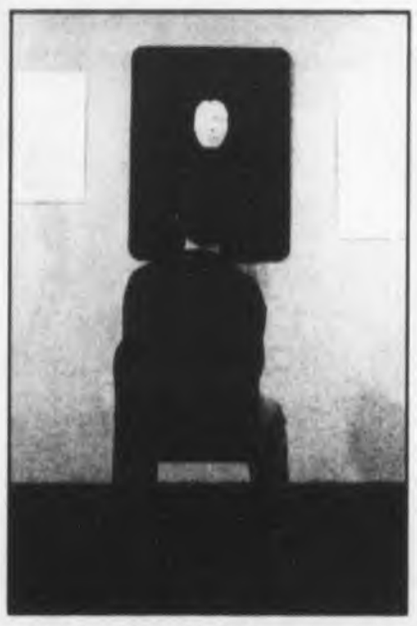
Hendricks already has spent more than half of the last 36 years in prisons or state hospitals for crimes against children.

The justices will review a ruling that struck down Kansas' 1994 law as unconstitutional. A decision is expected next year.



Forty-five states and territories have filed documents supporting the Kansas appeal, including five states with sexual-predator laws: Arizona, California, Minnesota, Washington and Wisconsin.

Hendricks began exposing himself to girls while he was a young airman at McConnell Air Base in Wichita. He was convicted in 1956 and fined $2.90.



After several other convictions, Hendricks testified that only his death would guarantee he would never again molest a child.

A jury sent him to the state's mental health facility in Larned, where he is one of nine men declared sexual predators. They can be kept there for treatment until doctors decide they no longer pose a threat. Exams are conducted at least once a year.

FACING REALITY

Art exhibit bring 20 AIDS patients' stories to life in different manner

ASHLEY CELLER
staff reporter

The Union Program Council Arts Committee is offering the opportunity to meet 20 people with AIDS by featuring an art exhibit in the Union art gallery. "Project Face to Face" was created by San Francisco artist Jason Dilley.

Since 1989, Dilley has been traveling around the country bringing his exhibit to colleges and museums.

"This was at the Smithsonian in Washington," Dilley said.

The exhibit allows people to look at the sculpture masks of people living with AIDS, and they can listen to their recorded stories of how AIDS has had an effect on their lives.

Dilley describes "Project Face to Face" as a traveling, living exhibit because it represents people who are living with AIDS, unlike the AIDS Memorial Quilt, which represents those who have died as a result of the disease.

Jennifer Griggs, UPC Arts Committee adviser, said displaying the AIDS quilt and "Project Face to Face" has really opened up people's eyes and educated them about what it is like to live — and die — with AIDS.

Not only will viewers get to see Dilley's work, but Dilley will be demonstrating how he makes the masks using volunteers from the community who are living with AIDS.

He will also be making masks later on in the week.

"Seeing how the masks are made gives people an artistic outlook of the exhibit, because it gives them a chance to see what is involved in the creation of the masks, not just the finished product," Griggs said.

Dilley said the process of making one mask takes about four hours, including the time it takes to dry. The actual time it takes to place the mask on the person is only about 30-40 minutes.

Jonas Sturr, coordinator for "Project Face to Face" and member of the UPC Arts Committee, said he hopes the exhibit makes people aware of the personal nature of people living with AIDS, because people who aren't directly affected by the disease in their daily lives don't understand the effect it has on the lives of those suffering from it.

"AIDS affects people from all walks of life. The exhibit shows the faces of women, men, adults, children and people of all ethnic backgrounds," Sturr said. "AIDS isn't very publicized in our community, and being that this is a university setting, it is important for students to be more educated about it and realize it does exist in this community."

Sturr said "Project Face to Face" is also meant to reach the community as a whole and to raise awareness in high schools as well as the University. Dilley will be giving a presentation to Manhattan High School during the week.

One way Dilley plans to reach out to the whole community is to lecture to different groups and give presentations about his work. The groups are limited to 15-20 people, and this gives people a chance to talk with Dilley and understand his view of the exhibit. Those interested can contact the UPC Arts Committee at 532-6571 to reserve a space to attend a presentation.

Outside the gallery, the Riley County Health Department has displayed the numbers of people in Kansas who have died from AIDS and who are still living with the disease.

The information, which was recently updated in June of this year, illustrates the 1,060 deceased victims of AIDS with black ribbons and the 641 people living with AIDS with red ribbons.

24 HOURS IN REVIEW

NATION WORLD

• OLYMPIC BOMBING UPDATE. More than four months after the Olympic bombing, the FBI posted a $500,000 reward for the bomber Monday and for the first time played a tape of the 911 warning call, hoping someone might recognize the man's deep, slow voice.

One-time suspect Richard Jewell, meanwhile, reached an undisclosed cash settlement with NBC over his claim that news anchor Tom Brokaw implied he was guilty of the bombing that left two dead and hundreds injured. FBI officials played the 911 recording three times. A transcript of the call, in which the man warned a bomb was in Centennial Park, had been released shortly after the July 27 bombing.

• JUDGE RULES JOHN DU PONT COMPETENT TO BEGIN MURDER TRIAL. John du Pont was found competent to stand trial Monday in the shooting of a wrestler despite defense claims that the millionaire defendant lives in a fantasy world.

Delaware County Judge Patricia Jenkins decided du Pont is capable of understanding the charges against him and scheduled his trial for Jan. 21.

If found incompetent, the 57-year-old heir to the DuPont Co. chemical fortune could have been confined to a mental hospital until deemed fit to stand trial for the slaying of world-class wrestler David Schultz.

• U.N. CHIEF ALLOWS OIL EXPORTS TO RESUME. The United Nations gave Iraq the go-ahead Monday to resume oil exports for the first time since 1990 to buy food and medicine for Iraqis suffering from the effects of international sanctions. In Iraq, people rejoiced when state media announced the deal Monday night. In Baghdad's poor neighborhoods, large crowds danced in the streets and shouted slogans in support of President Saddam Hussein.

Overjoyed celebrants fired guns into the air, prompting the government to warn them to stop shooting or face arrest.

• 7 KILLED IN ZAIRE SOCCER STAMPEDE. Soldiers fired tear gas to disperse soccer fans protesting a call, provoking a stampede in which seven people died and at least 100 were injured, national radio reported Monday.

The stampede erupted Sunday at Kamanyola stadium in the capital, Kinshasa, where a capacity crowd of about 80,000 was watching a match between the Vita Sports Club and Daring Club Motema Pembe, Sports Minister Aseya Mindre was quoted as saying.

• GM, UAW SIGN NEW 3-YEAR CONTRACT. General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers signed their new three-year labor contract Monday, formally ending the latest triennial round of Big Three bargaining.

The contract, which covers 215,000 UAW-represented workers, was overwhelmingly ratified last month. Like contracts signed earlier at Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler Corp., it includes new job-security provisions, increased wages and several benefit improvements.

The union won a guarantee that GM will maintain at least 95 percent of its jobs during the next three years, but the deal includes several exclusions that could allow GM to shrink its work force substantially through attrition.

• COAL MINERS' STRIKE CONTINUES. The coal industry said a weeklong miners' strike was losing strength Monday, but union leaders vowed to continue the walkout until workers get months' worth of back pay.

Labor leaders have warned President Boris Yeltsin's government they will call for a nationwide strike if the $8 billion the government owes in back wages is not paid.

Government promises to pay the miners for the past several months seemed to have encouraged some to return to work.

Rosugol, the state coal company, said 113,000 workers from 99 mines were still on strike Monday, the Interfax news agency reported.

Union spokesman Ivan Mokhnachuk disputed those numbers, saying at least 300,000 workers from 129 mines were still on strike and would remain off the job until the government met their demands.

Russia's coal industry employs more than half a million people.

NATION WORLD

• WEEKEND CLASHES KILL 32 AT PLATINUM MINE. A series of clashes involving rival tribes broke out over the weekend at a platinum mine in northern South Africa, killing at least 32 people. The fighting began after last week's slaying of a shop owner in the Freedompark squatter camp about 500 yards from the Wildebeestfontein South mine, police and mine officials said Monday.

The shop owner, a speaker of the Xhosa tribal language, earlier had killed a Sotho speaker who allegedly tried to rob his shop. A crowd of Sotho speakers then killed the shop owner.

About 200 police officers backed by 50 government soldiers intervened, and calm was restored by Sunday evening. The mine is near Rustenburg, about 100 miles northwest of Johannesburg.

• ZAIRIAN REBELS CAPTURE TOWN IN NORTHEASTERN ZAIRE. Zairian rebels said Monday they seized another town in northeastern Zaire and have surrounded the city of Bunia, where 3,000 government troops were left behind after most other soldiers fled.

Rebel leader Laurent Desire Kabila has vowed to topple President Mobutu Sese Seko's corrupt, 31-year regime. Mobutu is in France, convalescing from prostate cancer surgery.

Rebel forces have swept through eastern Zaire in the last few months, and retreating Zairian soldiers have been on a looting spree. Ten people were killed over the weekend as Zairian soldiers rampaged through Bunia, a large city near the Ugandan border.

Art, for the most part, transpires to be more than a purely visual experience into an emotional response from the viewer.

Gary Conrad thinks art can overcome this visual aspect, yet maintain the viewer's psychological perception.

Conrad, professor of biology and recipient of the 1996 Commerce Bank Distinguished Graduate Faculty Member Award, has proposed a new tool that would bridge the gap between the visual excitement of conventional art and the limited capacities of blind, or visually impaired, people.

Conrad unveiled his proposal while delivering the lecture "Developing an Eye for Art" on Thursday at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"We judge people's moods on their eyes," Conrad said.

Before developing his proposal, Conrad took the audience of nearly 100 people on an art excursion of paintings in their original form and with the eyes electronically digitized out.

"Whether we intend to or not, our eyes reflect a lot of information about us," he said. "Artists have known this for a long time."

In a portrait painting of an Elizabethan Englishwoman, her eyes evoked a deeper emotional state of content giving her a genteel air, while with her eyes removed the painting lacked psychological depth.
